cently reclaimed land in the South, Southwest, middle, and far West. Millions of acres of once barren land are now being made fertile by the wonders of irrigation and drainage and the once uninhabitable swamps of Florida, Georgia and Alabama are now being turned into Arcadias of fertility and prosperity. The barren deserts of the West have been moistened by the efforts of the irrigation engineer and undreamed-of results have been arrived at in these sections. The United States Government and the industrial and colonization departments of the larger transcontinental railroads are making an effort to attract settlers on these lands, and the moving picture machine is playing an important part in this effort. The Land Show at Pittsburg will include in its features a spacious lecture hall where government lecturers and experts from the various State Boards of Agriculture will give illustrated talks upon the many subjects pertaining to the land. These lectures will be illustrated by stereopticon views and motion pictures and will include such subjects as modern agriculture, farm life in the West, irrigation and drainage, reclamation, soil restoration, fertilization, harvesting, good roads, forestry, botany, horticulture, etc. The moving picture is gradually finding its educational level, and its value from this standpoint is easily apparent. The Chambers of Commerce, Boards of Trade and Industrial Boards of the less densely populated regions of the South and the West are awakening to this fact and are beginning to take advantage of this important factor in land development. These commercial bodies are expending annually millions of dollars in the exploitation of their territories and many of them are beginning to make appropriations for the taking of moving pictures in their sections which will be used to advantage in connection with the lectures to be given at the various land shows and industrial expositions now being held all over the country. The city dweller, tired of the ceaseless struggle for existence in the crowded city, is casting longing eyes in the direction of the country, while the farmers of the crowded East are seeking more fertile lands in districts which have not been worked to death and where larger crops are attracting the attention of the entire agricultural community. There is no better method by which the possibilities of irrigated lands and recently reclaimed districts can be brought to the attention of the prospective settler than by the motion picture, which shows the situation as it really is and brings a vivid picture before the eye. The moving picture is playing a useful and important part in this direction and its value cannot be overestimated. The Chicago Land Show proved to be one of the most successful indoor expositions ever held in the country, and, judging from the Pittsburg Show, which opened to an attendance of nearly twenty thousand, the results there will be equally satisfactory. The Pittsburg Land Show, which is supported by the United States Government and the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Colorado, California, Louisiana and Florida, is being held under the auspices of the Pittsburg Gazette Times and Pittsburg Chronicle Telegraph, two of Pittsburg's most powerful daily newspapers. Its offices are in the Keystone building, Pittsburg, Pa., to which all communications should be addressed.

TO OPEN 17 THEATERS IN CITIES OF COAST.

A. S. Hyman to Erect Building Here as Headquarters of Big Enterprise.

Los Angeles is to be the headquarters for a new system of stock company theaters, comprising seventeen play houses on the Pacific Coast.

A. S. Hyman, formerly president of the Chicago Dramatic Club, president of the Western Film Company and owner of a moving picture theater at 246 South Broadway, is the promoter of the enterprise.

The local stock house of the company will be erected on the site of the old Walter Lindley Building, on Sixth street, on the east side of the alley between Broadway and Hill. It was recently leased by Blenkiron Brothers from Dr. Walter Lindley for fifty years.

Mr. Hyman expects to close a deal for a ten-year lease, and within six months to begin the erection of a four or five story theater and office building. Mr. Hyman says he will be able to get possession of the property within half a year. He already has concluded negotiations for theater buildings in a number of Coast cities. San Diego, San Bernardino and Santa Barbara will be included with Los Angeles.

Mr. Hyman now is having constructed what will be two of the finest moving picture and vaudeville houses in the United States. They will be located at Eighth and Broadway and on Hill street, adjoining the California Club. The theater at Eighth and Broadway will be named the Hyman, and it will cost $35,000.

The building on Hill street has been leased for ten years at a total rental of $100,000. Mr. Hyman has just returned from Paris, where he adopted as his plan for the Hill street theater that of the Renaissance.

CHICAGO NOTES.

The following were visitors at the new offices of the Moving Picture World this week: T. A. Bryan, Lyric Theater, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; A. J. Diebold, Princess Theater, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; J. Rosenthal, Royal and Bijou Theaters, Dubuque, Iowa; Eugene Cook, Swastika Theater, Benton Harbor, Mich.; F. G. Gray, Swastika Theater, Benton Harbor, Mich.; E. D. Martin, African Film Syndicate, Johannesburg, S. A.; B. B. Risinger, Majestic Amusement Company, Memphis, Tenn.; P. Schuhmann, Geneva Theater, Geneva, Ill.

E. D. Martin, manager of the African Film Syndicate, Johannesburg, South Africa, stopped in Chicago on his way to Atlanta, Georgia, where he will visit relatives. Incidentally Mr. Martin is making arrangements with the manufacturers in this country so to better be able to handle his rapidly growing business. Mr. Martin informed us that the moving picture business is making wonderful strides in South Africa, and although the residents are living in a British possession, they greatly prefer American manufactured films.

T. A. Bryan, manager of the Lyric Theater, Cedar Rapids, Ia., was in the city last week for the purpose of purchasing a mirror screen. The Lyric has been running as a combination vaudeville and picture house, but according to the statement of Mr. Bryan the public demands exclusive pictures, therefore he has "cut out" the vaudeville, raised the standard of his film service, and made other improvements so as to be in position to give his patrons just what they desire, "high grade moving pictures."

That the public demand for high grade exclusive picture shows is general, is proven by the visit of A. J. Diebold, manager Princess Theater, also of Cedar Rapids. The Princess has been giving three acts of vaudeville, with moving pictures for "chasers" but commencing with this week the program will be reversed. High class pictures will be featured, and only one act of vaudeville will be given. Mr. Diebold claims that his patrons were so insistent in their demands for good moving pictures, that it necessitated his visit to Chicago to better his film service and procure higher class talent for his vaudeville.

The Independents in Chicago are greatly encouraged by the addition of many new supporters to their cause. On Monday, the Boston, on Madison street (Guy Morville, manager), commenced showing Independent releases. This is the first house in the Loop to take up the Independent cause, and rumor has it that others will soon follow. Any number of exhibitors throughout the country have expressed themselves as willing to go Independent, their only objection having been that they had no positive assurance of receiving good exchange service. This has in a large measure been overcome by the action of some of the largest exchanges resigning from the Patents Company, and no doubt the coming month will see a large number of recruits under the Independent standard.

Negotiations which have been pending for a period of several months, have been consummated during the past week between V. Gregory Linder, representing large financial interests in the Middle West, with headquarters in Chicago, and the Inter-State Vending Company, New York City, of which Max Spiegel, of the Spiegel Amusement Company, is president, whereby a contract has been made which contemplates the installation of 100,000 vending machines operating on the backs of chairs in theaters within the next five years. The territory controlled by this Western organization embraces the States of Michigan, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Illinois and contracts are already secured to install these machines in the various cities of these States, and installation will begin immediately. This machine operates with a penny and carries three varieties of gum and confections. It is a continuous machine essentially for the continuous show and is the only device made which applies thus directly to the moving picture field.

BOSTON, MASS.

G. F. Whalen is the third man to take up the managerial reins of Miss Lotta Crabtree's moving picture house on Washington street since its opening last Spring. Mr. Whalen has been lecturing on feature films for the Savoy since its opening day, and, from now on, will do double duty as manager and dramatic lecturer, Mr. Whalen lectured in the Star Theater, Tremont Row, Boston, for nearly one year, before going to the Savoy. He is a lecturer of great dramatic excellence with fine elocution and enunciation. This is Mr. Whalen's first attempt at managing a regular moving picture theater. Whether he has the necessary executive ability remains to be seen. At the time of this writing the Savoy is what is termed unsuccessful. A poor lobby, permitting of practically no posters or advertising is one of the greatest obstacles in this theater's way. The house has been running 5 reels of Independent film since the opening. Beginning Monday, October 17, the house changed the film service over to the licensed side. Whether this change plus the new manager will aid the Savoy can only be conjectured, as it is a most doubtful question. Harry Goldman will assist Mr. Whalen in his duties.

Frank Vine, first lieutenant to Mr. Maison of the General Film Company of Boston has recently made an exhaustive tour of the Western part of Massachusetts in order to look things over from a personal investigation. On his return, Mr. Vine stated that he found things very satisfactory, and that business was better than ever, with the licensed houses predominating in numbers over their Independent opponents.

Mr. Cook, New England representative for Mike Sheedy, was in Boston recently. "Just to look things over," was what Mr. Cook said.

William E. Greene's film exchange, 228 Tremont street, Boston, has recently enlarged its floor space by adding one additional floor. This exchange is the largest Independent house in the New England States. A policy of square dealing is the cause. It is amazing to note how Mr. Greene has enlarged his business. In addition to the film end of the game, Mr. Greene is also an exhibitor, being proprietor of a chain of houses, some large and some small Ralph Pinkham, who has been in charge of the film booking end of The General Film Company's office since that company bought it from Mr. Howard, and for two years prior to that, has lately become a benedict. Mr. Pinkham was married to Miss Dorothy McMuny of Orient Heights. Ralph certainly "got his" from the boys at the office, when the news came out. He is now enjoying a honeymoon trip.

Arthur Johnson, for two years connected with the theater Comique and the Premier Theater, of Boston, as manager, resigned recently to take a position with a house devoted to photography in Allentown, Pa.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES.

Southbridge, Mass., will soon have one more moving picture theater on its list. The house will be managed by Blanchard Bros. It is expected that the house will be completed about November 15.

A show of moving pictures and illustrated songs was recently opened in the Norfolk House, Dorchester, one of Boston's nearest suburbs. Manager Toomey states he does not believe in vaudeville used with his films, and for the start, will use no acts.

The Jeffries-Johnson fight films were exhibited by Walter Preston in Sheedy's Theater, Brockton, during the week of 10th. These films are big business makers, and no race riots or other nuisance has been caused by the public exhibition of these films wherever shown in the New England States.

Fred Lovett of Providence is now assistant treasurer of the Scenic Theater. He formerly held a similar position at the Empire Theater of Providence.

James O'Neil and William O'Leary have purchased Mr. Edward's interest in the Lyric Theater, Northampton, Mass., and, after renovating the house, will use it themselves as a first-class moving picture theater.

Good sources state that the Plymouth Theater, Plymouth, which has been playing legitimate road shows will be leased in November to a Boston corporation, who will turn the theater into a straight picture house This new plan leaves Plymouth without any theater devoted to dramatic productions, but the Cinematograph will easily take its place as the entertainment for the people of that city. The proposition looks like a good one.

The Imperial Theater of Providence, R. I., has been closed recently owing to the illness of Manager Bradstreet. The house will be opened shortly, as Mr. Bradstreet is now well on the road to a full recovery.

Louis M. Boas, manager of the Bijou and Premier Theaters of Fall River, has assumed charge of the Savoy Theater of that city. Chas. E. Cook retires from that theater

The Lyceum Theater of Marblehead, Mass., was destroyed by an early morning fire recently. The house will be rebuilt immediately.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Improvements now being made at the Bijou, 213 Eighth street, Cairo, Ill., include remodelling of the front and lobby and the installation of a new radio screen.

The Sand building, Main and Broad streets, Roanoke, Ill., is being remodelled for the Bodhaine & St. John electric theater.

Thomas C. German, of Springfield, Ill., proprietor of a moving picture show at Athens, and Miss Bessie Hough, of Springfield, were married in St. Louis.

Harley Snyder has opened a moving picture show at Mound City, Ill.

The new Grand Theater at Rock Falls, Ill., has been completed and with a nightly change of film is giving satisfaction to its patrons.

Fred Beck, outfielder with the Boston National League and one of the heaviest hitters in the National, has returned to Havana, Ill., where he is singing the illustrated songs at the 'Varsity, the moving picture theater owned by the Volunteer Fire Department of that city. His tenor voice has been an attraction at Havana picture shows for three Winters. Walter Davisson, who for over a year was singer at the 'Varsity, is now at W. W. Watts' Savoy, on North Sixth street, Springfield, Ill.

Buel B. Risinger, general manager of the Majestic Amusement Company, of Memphis, Tenn., spent four days in Chicago on business in connection with his theaters, making his headquarters at our offices. The Majestic Amusement Company operate three very high class exclusive picture houses in Memphis, and the management is always on the lookout for anything that will improve their service and please their patrons. While in the city Mr. Risinger purchased several musical instruments as well as a set of Orchestra Bells from J. C. Deagan, and engaged the services of two vocalists at a salary of $50 per week. The music for each of the Majestic theaters is furnished by an eight-piece orchestra, special music being arranged for each picture. Even in their advertising the Majestic Company use the best methods. The accompanying newspaper ad. illustrates their method, in which a synopsis of each release they run is given. This sort of advertising inspires confidence as well as creates an interest in the pictures, and the results are always very gratifying.

"TEN NIGHTS IN A BARROOM."

A Thanhouser Special.

Whoever suggested the above title for a photoplay in these days of "uplifters" and "reformers" should be sentenced to ten days' imprisonment. Let us hope that the makers of this film will use discretion so that the films will be used as a booster for and not a club against our common interests.

A feature film which the Thanhouser Company announce for release on November 4 will doubtless appeal to a great number of exhibitors and be shown in theaters in every part of the country. "Ten Nights in a Barroom" is full of great possibilities in picture making, and the Thanhouser Company can be depended on to get the best out of its varied situations. While such a name might suggest possible scenes that one would just as soon not see, the fact that all the Thanhouser releases are submitted to the Board of Censorship insures a picture that can be shown to any audience. We understand the picture is from the original book, the dramatic moral teaching of which has been well known and much used. As a moving picture the moral of the book will appear in its most telling manner and this Thanhouser release should become a classic among moving pictures.

CONVICTS SEE PICTURES.

With amazement, enjoyment and interest, nearly 100 prisoners at the penitentiary, for the first time in their lives, saw moving pictures which were exhibited in the State prison on September 25.—Columbus (O.) Journal.

"DRUMSTICKS": A Vitagraph Thanksgiving Life Portrayal.

Johnnie is presented with a young turkey by a kind farmer.

The cruel landlord takes the turkey on account of his rent.

Johnnie's estranged grandfather buys the fowl, bringing about a family reunion.

THE STORY OF "DRUMSTICKS."

Thanksgiving brings with it a season of good things and "Drumsticks" is one of them. The actors are well chosen and their acting is adequate, and everything about it seems to be seasonable and well done. The little boy who takes the part of "Johnny" is a clever youngster and has a winning way and presence about him, and even the turkey acts his part satisfactorily, making his entrance in the third scene as if he knew his business.

A kind-hearted farmer gives a poor boy a young turkey and he calls it "Drumsticks." The little fellow occupies all his time looking after little "Drumsticks" and soon it grows to be a big bird. "Drumsticks" is the pride and joy of Johnny's heart and his devotion to him is amusing and pathetic.

The landlord who has demanded the over-due rent from Johnny's mother, lays covetous eyes on "Drumsticks" and demands him in lieu of the money, and the poor turkey is made a sacrifice to avarice and greed. Johnny tries to hide his grief from his mother as he writes a note asking the one who buys "Drumsticks" for Thanksgiving dinner to let him know if he is as tender as he was good; then he fastens the note under the turkey's wing.

Johnny's grandfather happens to buy the turkey and it leads to a reconciliation with his daughter and makes a real Thanksgiving in which Johnny has his full share.

This whole "photoplay" breathes an atmosphere that is distinctly Thanksgiving and will doubtless prove a very acceptable and popular exhibit.

"THE MINISTER AND THE MOVING PICTURE."

There was a large attendance at the Baptist church, Mansfield, Mass., on a recent Sunday night to hear Rev. J. A. Wood preach on "The Minister and the Moving Picture." Those who expected to hear a sensational sermon were doomed to disappointment, for Mr. Wood delivered an interesting address, free from allegations and filled with helpful, valuable and suggestive ideas.

He believed a pastor of a church was pastor of the community, and if he found that there was crime being committed, deceit being practiced, or harmful influences being operated anywhere in the town the minister should raise his voice against them. His talk on the moving picture was a fair, impartial presentation. He believed motion pictures were educating an uplifting, capable of depicting the highest motives; but when they descend to the portrayal of crime, infidelity, murder and vulgarity, then there should be a determined opposition, for the contamination of the minds of the boys and girls is too serious a matter to be allowed. His praise for the way Pastime Theater is conducted was a compliment to the proprietors, but he did take exceptions to a picture shown containing a murder scene. Mr. Wood believed the general public would be better served and entertained if pictures of that nature were eliminated.

SIXTY OWNERS IN OHIO CITIES FORM THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF OHIO.

To war on undesirable features of the moving picture show business, to put it on as high a plane as possible, to establish closer business relations between exhibitors, 60 moving picture show men organized the Exhibitors' League of Ohio. If 1,300 exhibitors in Ohio can be organized, the plan is to associate exhibitors of the country at large.

CANNED DRAMA.

If the moving picture show has made inroads on the profits of the legitimate it is possibly due to the commercialism into which the art has fallen. Here is a suggestive paragraph that should tend to give pause to those who purvey the real drama for the edification of the public:

"Canned drama" is a good term for it, as we have fallen on times when genius must give place to the rule and plummet of physique—to color, abundance, and wave of hair—in short, to "type," which is to say, that if the actor can "look the part" it matters not how he butchers it. What would the great Hazlitt say if he were reincarnate, and with that mighty pen of his he were set to discuss the subject? He could only conclude that pelf is triumphant and art a scullion in the kitchen of Mammon.

"Tpye" has supplanted genius; looks have displaced talent. Notoriety, especially if there be a strong tinge of the salacious clinging around it, is in the limelight. Unheralded, what would Garrick, the greatest actor the world ever saw, do in New York in 1910? He would "walk Broadway," for his was not the "type." A mannikin would supplant him. The same is true of the matchless Kean, who, a pigmy in stature, could be the giant on the stage.

If the moving pictures have hurt the legitimate the men in charge of the legitimate are at fault for it.—Editorial, Washington Post.

A Revelation to the Moving Picture Business

JANET THEATRE
Equipped with a Mirror Screen

HYMAN BROS., Props. and Mgrs.
617 W. North Avenue
Chicago, Ill.

WHY the use of the Mirror Screen in theatres is increasing. The progressive Manager wants to show in detail the costly and wonderful reproductions the manufacturers are releasing weekly.

The progressive theatre owner or manager does not figure the original expense of an article of equipment such as the Mirror Screen is. It is always the biggest asset of any theatre, at the same time the cheapest investment you can possibly make.

The Mirror Screen is the greatest light economizer in existence, if you wish to use it for that one purpose alone. It increases your light 100 per cent., while it decreases the cost 50 per cent. We can show 1000 other ways to improve and reproduce your pictures in detail.

WAITER NO. 5.—"For ye have the poor always with you." Matt. 26, 11. Because of this we are reminded of the Corporal Works of Mercy—feed the hungry, clothe the naked, harbor the harborless—which acts always bring reward. Still there may be occasions when that reward comes tardily, but there is logical reason for the delay, for in the end our reward is more complete. The wife of the Russian Chief of Police being a woman possessed of a noble heart, is much touched by the tales carried to her of the tyrannical oppression bestowed upon the poor. After some persuasion on the part of a Russian artist socialist, she makes a round among the poor of the city, and the sight that greets her almost freezes the blood in her veins. She sees them huddled like cattle, more dead than alive, slowly but surely dying for want of nourishment. So moved is she with the truth, that she becomes an ardent sympathizer and consents to become a member of the secret society to oppose the government in its present treatment of the poor. The meetings of this society are held at the artist's studio, a fact the police have long suspected. On the night of the admission of the wife as a member, a raid is planned by the police, and you can imagine the Chief's amazement as he enters to find his wife just taking the oath of allegiance. What a shock! At first he is at a loss to know what best to do. Finally dismissing his men with their captives, he, alone with her, asks what it means. She tells him in a word, and he, realizing her fate will be death, determines to join her in an effort to fly from Russia. Disguising themselves as peasants, they succeed in evading interception and arrive safely in America. In this country he finds it impossible to obtain congenial employment, and is forced to accept a position as waiter in a swell restaurant, which he keeps secret from all but his wife. Being a gentleman born, he is successful, and when his American-born son is old enough he is able to send him to college. Later, when the boy returns home from college, he is apprised of the engagement between the son and the sister of his college friend. The son is still in ignorance of the nature of his father's employment, and is warned not to marry for the present at least, the father intending to resign the waiter position as soon as possible. The young folks refuse to wait, and elope. After their marriage they receive the blessings of the girl's parents but the boy's parents are not to be located, so the party goes out to have a little wedding dinner, selecting by singular coincidence the restaurant at which the father is employed. Amazement and embarrassment seize the entire party, and the father then tells his son why he asked him not to marry. The excitement attending this unexpected meeting arouses the notice of other occupants of the dining room, and one of their number approaches, recognizing the waiter. This man proves to be the Russian's old friend, who after a tireless search is now given the opportunity of bestowing upon his former Chief the Czar's pardon, which restores his social standing. So culminated his troubles.

TWO LITTLE WAIFS: A MODERN FAIRY TALE.—There is nothing worldly that makes a stronger appeal to the human heart than the grief of the little child. Children are so seldom made to feel the weight of woe, that when they do suffer real sorrows we are sure to weep with them. One of the most important of God's lessons is taught by the child—sincerity, and the child's tears will wash from our soul the stain of indifference, selfishness and artifice. The child is the real sunshine of life, and when Mrs. Weston lost her only little one, she, though a widowed mother, experienced her greatest grief. Her future seemed destined to be clothed in gloom. Her heart almost breaks as she views the empty crib in which her departed little girl formerly slumbered. About this time there are brought to a neighboring orphan asylum two little girls, whose mother has died and left them dependent. The poor little tots cry incessantly for their mama, but the good sisters tell them that their mama has gone to Heaven and is now at God's house. They then cry that they want to go to mama, indicating that they will surely go. The next day during recreation hour on the asylum grounds, they take advantage of the excitement attending a quarrel between two of the children and slip out through the gate. Once outside, they start off to find mama in Heaven, asking passersby, "Which way is Heaven?" After a long and tiresome journey, they come to the mansion of Mrs. Weston, which is a veritable paradise. Its grandeur convinces them that they have at last reached the goal. Through the broad flower-lined avennes the little ones wander until they come upon Mrs. Weston seated on one of the verandas. Approaching her they ask: "Please, mam, is this Heaven, and is our mama here?" Mrs. Weston, of course, does not understand their query at first, but it suddenly dawns upon her when she sees them clasp each other weeping. Also, their asylum garb indicates where they came from, and what they are—waifs. It being late in the afternoon, she decides to keep them overnight at her home, placing them in the empty crib. The sight of these two little darlings sleeping in the little crib dispels the gloom that has enveloped her and she makes up her mind never to part with them, hence she writes to the asylum the following letter: "Dear Mother Ignatius: The two little waifs that came to me I have decided to adopt legally, and take this opportunity to bestow a regular endowment in the support of your great charity as a memorial to my lost child. Sincerely yours, Helen E. Weston."

EDISON MFG. CO.

THE HOUSE OF THE SEVEN GABLES.—There is a carpenter by the name of Maule who owns a pretty little cottage in the historic town of Salem. A great man of the village, Col. Pyncheon by name, fancies this place as a site for a great house for his own family. He makes an offer of purchase which Maule refuses. He then insists upon buying whether the poor man will or no. When he meets with a stubborn refusal his wits set to work, and the days of witchcraft being at their height, he soon sees a way of accomplishing his purpose. Maule is accused of witchcraft and is arrested in his own home and dragged away from his wife, daughter and son. Then a startling scene is shown in which the carpenter is being led to the stake to be burned. The fires are lighted, and as the flames leap toward their victim we see the unfortunate man pronounce a curse upon Colonel Pyncheon and upon his house and children and their children's children.

The next scene shows Maule's son, a young man, engaged upon some finishing touches in the work of the great house which Colonel Pyncheon has built upon the site of father Maule's dismantled cottage. Being left alone in the room, the son notices a grant from the king to a vast territory in the East—a grant which means the fortunes and affluence of the whole Pyncheon family. He secretes this document in a niche in the wall in the very room where he finds it, behind the great picture of Colonel Pyncheon's father. When the great man returns and misses the document he flies in a passion and would pursue the young man, but at that moment he finds himself confronted by a vision of the older Maule at the stake, his clenched hands upraised as he again seems to hurl the awful curse at the cringing rascal. The sight is so terrible that the old man falls back in his chair dead, and is found there by the villagers when they come to see the great house for the first time.

Then the scene shifts to the fortunes of the family two hundred years later. The descendant who occupies the house is an old maiden woman, whose circumstances are so reduced by the lack of this wonderful grant from the king that she opens a little shop in the lower part of the house. She is not a very successful storekeeper and takes a lodger, a young man who bears a great resemblance to the Maule family of preceding generations, and who watches her unsuccessful business efforts until a young niece of hers, an embodiment of youth and buoyancy, comes to help her with the shop. Trade immediately picks up because of the young girl's fascinations, and the fortunes of the family mend a little, while the lodger becomes interested in the Pyncheon family from an entirely new point of view. It is evident, too, that the interest is mutual.

One day, while he and the young girl are away for the day, Judge Pyncheon, a miserly relative and an exact prototype of the original Pyncheon, comes to the house and insists upon the family's right to have it razed to the ground and a thorough search made for the missing grant. In his search he almost stumbles upon the button which would open the space behind the portrait, but just as his finger rests upon it the ghostly figure of Maule at the stake appears above him and warns him away. The shock is too great for the old man, and like his ancestor he drops into the same antique chair and breathes his last.

When the young people return to the house they find the man dead, and that the aunt has been frightened by the happening and stolen away. She returns, however, in time to hear the young man announce his love and his right to speak of it even in the presence of death. He tells the whole secret of the story of "The House of the Seven Gables," which is that the curse pronounced upon the Pyncheons is operative until the mighty force of love overrules it. His love for the young girl and hers for him can remove the curse; and as evidence that it is gone he steps to the old portrait, pushes the button, and as it swings out, shows them the long lost grant from the king, and, raising it, places the fortune in the hands of the girl.

A WEDDING TRIP FROM MONTREAL THROUGH CANADA TO HONG KONG.—In any event a honeymoon ought to be a chapter in life long to be remembered, and we are sure that the sweet bride and the big groom of the Edison picture will never forget their honeymoon trip from Montreal, Canada, to Kong Kong, China; for many were the mishaps which befell them—mishaps which somehow or other seemed to furnish a lot of fun and amusement for everybody except "Dearie" and "Lovey."

After a rousing send-off from their friends, who follow their gaily decorated cab to the depot, they reach their train and the trip begins—and with it a chain of accidents to the "Newlyweds," which will tickle the ribs of any audience. "Lovey" starts the ball rolling when he insists upon taking a snapshot of "Dearie" as she poses on the rear end of the train while it stops for a moment at a water tank station. While he gazes at her fondly through the lens of his camera the train pulls out, and fond hearts are soon separated by miles of distance. Thanks to a hand-car and a good fat tip, however, "Lovey" gets a "lift" after he has counted a few weary miles of railroad ties, and his forlorn little bride soon weeps tears of joy on his manly shoulder. When they get into the train the fun begins in earnest with their first meal together, which, with the other passengers and the train attendants, we are permitted to see. This time "Lovey" is to blame again, and it's all due to his too great solicitude—well meant but disastrous.

And so the fun continues until, with the amorous pair, we reach the Hot Sulphur Swimming Pool at the Banff Hotel, where "Lovey's" inability to swim results in his spoiling a suit of clothes—whereat "Dearie" actually seems to be just the least bit amused!

From here we follow them, our interest divided between the ludicrous actions of the pair and the magnificent scenery along the way, until they board the great Pacific steamship, "The Empress of India." They are hardly on board before "Lovey's" curiosity overpowers him and he tries to find out, perhaps for the purpose of impressing "Dearie" with his knowledge, the purpose of the great air funnels on the deck of the ship. He finds out after he makes a "shoot-the-chute" drop into the coal bunkers in the hold of the ship, from which he is rudely hoisted, a mass of dirt, soot and coal dust, into the waiting arms of his terrified bride. We leave them on board, confident that if a poor beginning guarantees a good ending we may safely wave them a hearty bon voyage as the big ship fades in the distance.

THE BOUQUET.—George Harris and his pretty wife have ceased to care very much for each other. George is indifferent and his wife sensitive and when the young husband realizes their strained relations he endeavors to revive the old love. However, his overtures of peace and his evident willingness to "make up" are not accepted and with a sigh he takes his hat and leaves the house.

In the park he seats himself dejectedly on a bench, endeavoring to think of some plan through which he can win back his wife's love. Brooding over his troubles he does not notice the approach of two ladies, apparently mother and daughter, who sit down on the bench beside him. Through a slight accident, when the girl drops her book and Harris returns it, he starts a conversation, and the meeting ends with the young lady and he exchanging cards.

Harris sets out to walk to his office, recalling pleasantly the happy meeting and wishing his wife were as sweet natured as the little lady he had just left. A desire to see the young girl again takes possession of him, but he resists the temptation to return to the park and compromises with a resolve to send her a box of flowers.

At the florist's store he orders a great bouquet of roses and attached to the box a card bearing the name and address of the young lady. A messenger boy is hurried off to the address given and Harris goes on to his office.

On the way the boy meets a few other young street Arabs and joins them in a game of "craps," but they are interrupted by a policeman and in the hurried getaway the boy loses the card.

He returns to the florist's, but neither of them can recollect the name and address, when the florist seems to recall that the flowers were for Mrs. Harris.

The petulant wife is surprised when she opens the flowers and finds they are from her husband, and at the end of the long day, when her husband has returned, she has made up her mind to give him more of her love.

He finds her smiling and pleased and upon her explanation about the flowers, which, to him, is at first a mystery, opens his arms and takes her to his heart.

HANK AND LANK.—Hank and Lank have had some unusually strenuous experiences since we saw them last, and wandering lazily about town they stop before a furniture store in front of which are displayed two large, commodious Morris chairs, which look particularly inviting to the two tired hoboes.

With the air of prospective buyers they stop to casually examine the chairs, and upon looking about to make sure the proprietor is not in sight, Lank throws his tired form back into the cushions and shortly Hank follows his example. Presently both drop off to pleasant dreams.

In the meantime a policeman and a nurse-maid with a go-cart pass by and stop a little way down the street for a moment's flirtation. As they talk two boys, bent on mischief, come on the scene, see Hank and Lank asleep and the copper busy at love-making. One of them suggests they have some fun with the hoboes and incidentally "get even" with the neighborhood terror, the police officer.

A handy awning rope is slipped from a hook on the furniture store, a loop made and slipped over Lank's lank calf, while the other end is deftly tied to the leg of the policeman. One of the boys then awakens Lank, excites his anger, and Lank indignantly rises to give chase. With his long legs, Lank would have easily overtaken the youngsters were it not for the rope and 250 pounds of the law attached to the other end. Lank falls sprawling and so does the policeman.

The following scenes are extremely funny. Lank, encouraged by his little partner, drags the policeman across two lots and dashing into a barnyard closes the gates, unties the rope on his own leg and securely ties the officer to the fence. Hank and Lank then make a hasty getaway while the poor copper is left to his own resources in extricating himself.

THE SILENT MESSAGE.—Jeff Sanders, outlaw, has been captured by the sheriff, who is taking him by rail to the nearest lock-up. Jeff is desperate and when the train slows down to a curve he makes a leap through the window and, despite his handcuffs, escapes serious injury. Before the sheriff can leave the train and pursue him Jeff has taken refuge in the gulches of the rough country and the officer's only hope of recapture is to notify the sheriff of the next county, who makes a fruitless attempt to get the outlaw.

Up in the hills, Jeff breaks the handcuffs over a stone, and so is free, but hungry and unarmed. His opportunity of securing a weapon comes when he sees Cal Evans, a cowpuncher, dismount to tighten a cinch. Stealing up behind the unsuspecting cowpuncher, Jeff jerks the revolver from the man's belt, and at the point of a gun forces him to give up his horse. He is now mounted and armed and is sure he will be able to get a good start before the cowboy can give the alarm.

Soon he comes to the lonely ranch house of the Lazy K outfit, where Gladys, the ranchman's daughter, is alone except for Prairie Flower, a deaf and dumb Indian girl. Gladys has taught the squaw the white man's finger talk, and the girl repays her benefactor with a strong devotion peculiar to her race. We see Gladys despatch the squaw on an errand to the spring, instructing her in the sign language, and the squaw takes the bucket and goes out.

Scarcely has she gone when Jeff enters the house, and threatening Gladys with the revolver, orders her to prepare a meal for him. She has no fear of him so long as she complies with his demand and sets food before Jeff, who eats ravenously. His appetite satisfied, the ungrateful outlaw makes advances to Gladys, who now realizes that she is in a dangerous position.

However, she is a resourceful girl, and in seeking for some way out of her predicament she remembers Prairie Flower. Concealing her resentment of Jeff's love-making, she so manoeuvers as to place herself between him and the window, and glancing out sees the Indian girl returning from the spring.

She gives no sign of this to Jeff, who is unaware there is another human being within miles of the ranch house. Carrying out her pretense of a flirtation with the outlaw, she seats herself coquettishly on the window sill, and while talking and joking with him she slips one hand out of the window and attracts the attention of the squaw. In sign talk she tells the girl of her plight, and that she will hold the man there until the Indian girl can bring the boys or the sheriff to effect the capture. The Indian girl obeys the silent order and after a wild ride finds and notifies the sheriff, who gathers a posse and follows her back to the ranch house.

Here matters are reaching a crisis. The girl's mild responses to Jeff's attentions no longer satisfy him, and in desperation she makes an attempt to get the revolver from him. She tries to escape into the open, but he blocks the door, and then believing her entirely cornered and at his mercy, he again attempts to take her in his arms.

But in his pursuit of the girl he has grown careless, and does not hear the approaching horses outside. The door is flung open, and before the surprised outlaw can make a move in his defense, he is in the hands of the posse, whom the deaf squaw has brought to the rescue of her mistress.

INDIAN PETE'S GRATITUDE.—A halfbreed Indian is befriended by a settler and in addition is given a job in the settler's family where he becomes the devoted servant of the settler's daughter. As time progresses the girl's father becomes interested in some recently discovered mining claims and decides to buy one which has not yet been registered. Some claim jumpers who by chance learned of the deal started to get possession of the claim by getting to the registry office first and in order to accomplish this, one of them holds up the girl's father while the other rides to town to make the entry. The halfbreed gets wind of the conspiracy and is able to warn the girl who mounts her favorite pony and races with the claim jumpers to the registry office. She is enabled to win out through the pluck of the halfbreed who holds up the claim jumpers until she gets a good lead but in his efforts to help the girl the young halfbreed is mortally wounded and thus gives up his life for his white friends.

THE STRONGEST TIE is centered in a lumber camp where two young lumbermen are working and incidentally are suitors for the hand of the same girl. One of them wins and is betrothed to the girl, but a turn of fortune takes him to another job in a distant lumber camp where he meets with an accident which destroys his memory. The girl waits for him faithfully until she is convinced that he is dead and then marries the other suitor. Several years later the first man suddenly recovers his memory, comes back to claim the girl. She in the meantime has settled down to domestic life and has a little girl four or five years of age but the return of the man to whom she was betrothed in former years, naturally revives her love for him and after a great struggle with herself she finally resolves to run away from her husband. The climax of the story takes place when her husband acknowledges the rights of the former lover and gives up the wife. As she is about to leave, the little child toddles in and the theme of the play at once becomes apparent, namely, that mother love is "The Strongest Tie" after all.

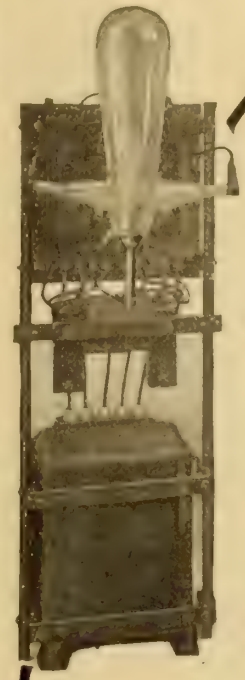
Four Users of the G-E Rectifier Testify in Unmistakable Terms



Many of the users of the G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier have written us of their satisfaction with this device. Its value as a means of transforming alternating into direct current for moving picture machines has been amply demonstrated.

The following extracts from four letters tell the story better than we possibly can: Read what users say.

IMPROVED LIGHT

"We have been using the Mercury Arc Rectifier in connection with our moving picture machines for about two and one-half years and find the quality of light obtained is very much better than that obtained by using alternating current in the lamps."

HOWELL GRAHAM, "Theato," Chattanooga, Tenn.

GREAT SAVING

"The Rectifier you furnished my Mission Street Theatre some six weeks ago is giving all we could expect in the way of good light and economy in fact the saving is so great that I am thinking seriously of putting one in my Fillmore Street house and use the alternating current instead of direct current."

F. B ROSS, Mgr., Premium Theatre Co., San Francisco, Cal.

RUNS WITHOUT ATTENTION

"We have used a G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier machine for almost two years We have had at all times an excellent light and have saved a great deal in the cost of current. We have had no trouble with it—in fact it runs without any attention at all from us."

THE PRINCESS THEATRE, N. Y. City.

LONG TUBE LIFE

"I have two G-E Rectifiers in use right now and would not be without them at any cost. I believe I put the first one in use in the Pacific Coast in a picture house, and what is more I have had the same tube on it since the day it was hooked up 17 months ago."

WALTER McNEISH, Bijou Theatre, Tacoma, Wash.

YOUR Theatre Can Be Improved, Too

If you are obliged to use an alternating current supply, find out about the G-E Rectifier. Sign and mail the attached coupon. Your case will be studied by engineers, who will tell you just how much you can benefit by using this device. Send the coupon at once.

matic. A young woman has a great affection for a man residing in the same hotel. Her affection is misplaced, however, for the feeling is not returned. Flirting he has been playing with her, she determines to revenge herself, and finds for this a ready helper in a man also staying at the hotel. He places in the young fellow's pocket some playing cards, and that same evening at the Casino, when these two are playing cards with a party, the young fellow is accused by the man of cheating, and the cards being found on his person, as is shown out. From that date his life is a misery, but his uncle, certain of his innocence, offers a reward for information as to who placed the cards in his nephew's pocket. The real culprit being in want of cash comes forward, gets the money, and confesses his guilt, and is compelled by the angry old man to accompany him to the Casino and publicly announce the fact.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

THE SIGNET RING.—Prince Walter, having heard of the beauty of Princess Bertha, sends an envoy to ask her hand of her father. The proposal is accepted and the envoy gives to Princess Bertha an engagement ring.

The chief adviser of Bertha's father, who wishes a brilliant marriage for his own daughter, Rosamund, plots to substitute her for the princess.

The Princess Bertha leaves her father's castle, en route for her new residence, accompanied by the adviser, Wilfrid.

When they are a long way on their journey, Wilfrid abandons the princess in the wood and substitutes his daughter, Rosamund. He takes her on to Prince Walter, who greets her as his fiancee.

Meanwhile, Princess Bertha has been given a home by woodmen and has caused them to marvel at her skill in weaving silken cloth. Bertha now embroiders a beautiful shawl which the wife of the woodcutter offers for sale at the castle. Prince Walter demands an audience with the person who embroidered the shawl and, led by the woodcutter, is soon in the presence of Princess Bertha, who still wears on her finger the wedding ring offered by the prince. Wilfrid's plot is then discovered, and while he and his daughter are imprisoned, Prince Walter solemnly recognizes Princess Bertha as his wife.

THE LIFE OF MOLIERE.—We first see Moliere at work in his father's shop, when a boy. All the employes are busy at their appointed tasks, except the youthful playwright, who snatches time to re-read one of his earliest efforts. The door opens and the Italian comedian, Scaramouche, enters in quest of a particular style of chair. Moliere tenders his play for perusal; but, just as Scaramouche begins to be interested, Poquelin, the father of Moliere, comes in unexpectedly and the play is hastily thrown out of sight. Again the boy poet places it in the comedian's hand, and some clever work is done by Scaramouche, as he tries to read the manuscript without being detected by the stern upholsterer.

The next scene shows Moliere at the Louvre palace, where he meets Louis XIV. for the first time. Here we see the scorn of the courtiers for the actor-dramatist and the consideration shown for him by the King. This scene will be remembered for the delicate beauty of the interiors shown.

Next we view the stately splendor of the festival at Versailles, where hundreds of courtiers, ladies in waiting and great nobles attend on Louis XIV. The beauty of the court costumes, which set the fashion for all the royal houses in Europe at that time, and the courtly air and demeanor of every individual in the royal pageant, have been faithfully reproduced. One cannot but marvel at the excellence of the training of this vast throng, every one of whom acts his or her part as if manor-born. We must take off our hats to this Gaumont producer.

As Moliere comes into the scene, the acting of the King, the courtiers and of the great actor himself, is faultless. When the King places his arm around Moliere's shoulders and walks off with him, it is a delight to watch the faces of the surprised and jealous train of followers. And when next we see Louis seated at table with Moliere, serving him with his own hands, the cup of the courtiers is full.

The scene showing the distraction of Moliere over the desertion of his wife is a pathetic picture and displays talented emotional acting. Then, when she appears before finally leaving him, and we watch the play of coquetry on her witching face and note her charm of manner and grace of deportment, we do not wonder at poor Moliere's abandonment to despair. The attempt of the faithful maid servant to arouse Moliere from his apathy and melancholia is a brilliant specimen of silent acting in both roles.

The last appearance of Moliere, and his first in the role of Malade, is a fine depiction of the stage of the tennis court theater and of the French manner of acting a part in the seventeenth century. Then follow his sudden illness and death.

ROMANCE IN THE ROCKIES.—Dick Sterling, young miner, defends Red Fox, an Indian, from the wanton attack of a trio of Mexicans and wins Red Fox's gratitude. The Mexicans, Juan Mendoza in particular, swear to get even and opportunity for revenge with reward comes when they learn that Sallie Barton, Dick's sweetheart, has located a placer mine. Dick is working the claim for her and they plan to rob him. Sallie has seen them coming through the woods and climbs into a tree to evade them. They halt under the tree to complete their plot and she overhears their scheme and hurries to warn Dick. In her haste she slips on the rocks and hurts her ankle. Her pistol shots are heard by Red Fox, who takes her in his canoe to the camp, where the cowboys are warned and set out in pursuit of the trio of desperadoes who have stolen horses on which to make their getaway. Meantime Red Fox hurries back to the mine and traces the trail of the greasers to the tree to which they have bound Dick, and with Dick on the Indian pony they head for camp, reaching there as the boys return after having captured the three offenders. At first a lynching was intended and the ropes are already about the necks of the horse thieves, when the minister interferes and induces them to turn the captives over to the sheriff. He rides back to camp with them and his presence suggests the marriage of Dick and Sallie as a fitting termination to the day's adventure.

FALSE LOVE AND TRUE.—Disgusted by the very evident attempts to win her fortune rather than her heart, the heiress decides to go in search of true love and finds employment in a store while she rooms in a cheap boarding-house. The boarder in the next room is a manly young mechanic, very different from the fashionable idlers and fortune hunters she has encountered, and a treat of ice-cream after the day's work means more than did the opera in the olden days. The little heiress finds not only happiness but love, though her sweetheart is slow in making his declaration. Things come to a head when the heiress is warned that one of her most persistent suitors has discovered her address and he tries to force his attentions upon her. He gets very demonstrative when the young mechanic answers the call for help and throws the schemer out in no gentle manner. Then he makes his own declaration of love and is accepted. They are wed in the boarding-house parlor where love had its birth, and the groom has no idea of his bride's wealth until she leads him into her handsome home and explains her deception. He is taken aback, but, after all, love is what counts and the discreet servants, who blunder upon a tender passage, arrive at the same decision.

EDITH'S AVOIRDUPOIS.—Edith was fat and was geting fatter all the time. Then she ran across a book on physical culturé that hinted that fat was fatal to love. Edith wanted to hold her husband's love, so she started training but said nothing to her husband about it. It was bad enough when she lunched off excelsior and dined on baled hay, but when she donned sweater and short skirt and started to do some road work the real trouble commenced. Almost as bad were the facial gymnastics prescribed by the book to eliminate wrinkles. When Edith's husband saw those horrible grimaces he was certain that she had gone insane, and the doctor inclined to the same opinion. It looked very much as though it would be a nice, quiet, padded cell for Edith, but in the end she produced the book and explained that it was to hold her husband's love. Then hubby told her that he loved her best when she was her own fat self and not an imitation of a jack-in-the-box, so Edith threw the book away and decided that there were worse things than too much flesh.

UNDER THE STARS AND BARS.—A soldier is always subject to his country's call, therefore it is with a quick response that the young officer of the Confederate army, fighting under the Stars and Bars, answers the call of duty and tells his wife that he must join his regiment and meet the enemy. Bidding his weeping young wife and child a hasty good-bye, we next see him with the cavalry en route to the military camp.

His superior officers trust him with an important message and he immediately starts on his way to deliver the document. Passing over many perilous obstacles through a wide stretch of country, he reaches the outposts of the Union forces, where he is captured and made a prisoner of war.

Under close guard he tries to send word to his wife, but can get no one to take the letter to her. The poor wife knows nothing of his fate and it is not long before the Federal troops are attacking old Vicksburg, the bombs and shells crashing into the houses, and she is driven from home.

When the war is over in 1865, the husband, who has lost an arm and is suffering from fever, returns to his home to find it deserted. Unable to learn the whereabouts of his family, he goes to the hospital, where he is ill, and constantly grieves after his wife and child.

Convalescent, he is wheeled about the city park by an attendant in an invalid's chair. His wife and daughter, now a good-sized girl, are in the park. A peddler of fruit passes by and the little girl buys some oranges from him; at the same time she sees the sick soldier, for whom she feels very sorry, gives him one of her oranges, and he kisses her in return. The little girl tells her mother about the incident and insists upon her mother going to see the sick man.

To humor the child she goes with her and soon discovers that the man is her own husband and father of their child. This happy reunion of the three loving hearts presents a picture that impresses itself deeply on one's mind and we cannot resist the rising sob and the sympathetic tear.

PATHE FRERES.

ANOTHER'S GHOST.—Tony, a variety artist, by his clever impersonations pleases the manager of a traveling circus, and is engaged as one of the troupe. After the show is over that night, the old showman, with the proceeds of the day's performances in his pockets, sets off in search of fresh talent. Overtaken by a severe storm, he takes refuge at a lonely country inn. Getting a glimpse at the contents of his wallet, the innkeeper's cupidity is aroused. His wife surreptitiously removes the wallet. The old man discovers his loss, and, in the act of accusing the guilty couple, falls dead. The innkeeper has secretly dropped a deadly poison into his glass of wine. The innkeeper afterwards hides the bag in a secret cupboard, and informs the authorities of the old showman's death. His identity is discovered, and news of his death is sent to the circus. Tony arrives, and questions the innkeeper as to the wallet, but he denies all knowledge of it. Tony's suspicions are aroused, and an idea occurs to him. The innkeeper is haunted by a vision of the showman. Suddenly the door opens, and the guilty pair are confronted by a spectre of the dead man. They are made to confess their guilt, and Tony their throws off his disguise and hands the guilty pair over to the police.

MOTOR FIEND.—Here is a film that will be appreciated by both classes—those who own automobiles and those who do not. They will all laugh and scream when they see it. The plot is so new, so fresh, so untouched, and the idea of it is so comic, that it is almost a mistake to even hint at the absurdly funny scenes the picture depicts. There is, however, one thing it seems right to tell—the story is the dream of a motor fiend. He dreams that his auto is fitted with a "joy meter," and that all speed limits have been eliminated. What is a "joy meter" you all want to know, and we suppose we must tell you this so that you can have an idea of what the picture is about. A "joy meter" consists of various dials or indicators arranged on an attachment that fits to the front of any motor, and that indicates the number of men, women, policemen, dogs, hens, or mothers-in-law that you may happen to run over. It is most accurate in its work, but in order to understand it properly you must see the film, which gives a most vivid and graphic idea of its operation.

BRUGES, BELGIUM.—Quaint old Bruges is one of the Dead Cities of Belgium, and after the canals the mediaeval aspect of the town is its most striking feature. Interesting specimens of Flemish architecture of the Middle Ages are to be met with at every turn. The canals, which both surround and intersect the town, are always picturesque and interesting, and often very beautiful. The Minnewater or Lac d'Amour, a beautiful sheet of water, upon whose scarcely rippled surface the reflection of the bridge which spans it is always clearly outlined, is well known to tourists, as also is the Belfry with its famous chimes. Other objects of interest are the Beguinage bridge, the Hotel de Ville or Townhall, the old King's Palace, and the Maison du France. A picture of one of the weekly markets held in the Grande Place beneath the shadow of the Belfry is included in the film, the lack of animation displayed being characteristic of the whole life of the town. The last picture of the film is a typical one of pillow lace-makers at their doors busily manipulating their bobbins in the manufacture of Bruges lace.

MAX IN THE ALPS.—Max has fallen in love with a pretty widow staying in the Alpine district. The widow is not at all certain that her light-hearted adorer will not soon turn to other loves. She proposes, therefore, as a test of his devotion, that he shall gather her a sprig of edelweiss, that rare flower that is only to be found on the tops of the mountains. Max starts out to execute his mission, and with his immaculate silk hat, light cane, and accurately creased trousers commences forthwith the ascent of an Alpine peak, evidently considering that the warmth of his passion will keep the cold out. He sights one of the blossoms through his telescope and heroically plunges through the snow, prodding his way with his stick and stumbling, slipping, and falling. Now he will disappear almost entirely beneath a mass of snow, with the top of his hat only to be seen, the next minute he has emerged and is struggling upwards. It is a hopeless task to attempt to describe the whole of the climb, which is rich in humor of the right sort. We will pass over the various incidents until the time when Max, having measurably decreased the distance between him and the longed-for flower, makes a false step and falls down the mountain. Luckily he is unhurt, but his spirits and his silk hat are both crushed. He screws his eye to the glass, takes a peep at the far-away flower which seems to mock at his misery, and decides to relinquish the task. He accordingly picks himself up and makes his way towards his hotel. On the way he meets an edelweiss seller, and in an instant makes up his mind what to do. He purchases a blossom, and bearing it away with great care, lays it in triumph at the feet of his enchantress.

BUFFALO FIGHT. This is a characteristic picture taken in one of the islands of Oceania which includes besides the actual representation of the fight itself, a number of views of the preparations for the combat, and of the field of spectators. After the business of choosing the combatants has been satisfactorily concluded, the horns of a couple of the buffaloes are sharpened and they are led into the field. The two buffaloes, finding themselves face to face, engage in a struggle which the excited crowd watches with vivid interest until the finish. The field is not kept clear and the spectators are allowed to cross it in all directions so that the sight of the two fighting buffaloes and the people persistently wandering from one side of the stretch of grass to the other is at times rather curious.

THE INDIAN AND THE MAID.—Ruth and Jack are in their teens and are sweethearts. Ruth having been invited out to her uncle's ranch to live, starts out, and is met by him at the little railroad depot. As they leave the station her uncle almost knocks over an Indian, Swiftfoot by name, whom Ruth prevents from injuring him. Swiftfoot is struck with admiration for Ruth, and noticing that she has dropped her glove, gallops after the wagon, and hands it to her. Two weeks later Ruth goes out riding through the rough Western country, and getting off her pony to admire the scenery, slips over a fifty foot precipice into the boiling torrent below. Swiftfoot, coming by, sees the pony and quickly perceives Ruth's plight. Taking a rope from his saddle, he lowers himself from an overhanging rock and catches her as she sweeps along. With difficulty he climbs up the cliff with Ruth on his shoulder, and throwing her across his horse takes her back to the ranch, where under proper treatment she soon recovers. As a token of gratitude her uncle decides to have Swiftfoot educated, and before he leaves the ranch Ruth gives him a rose which he places in his pocket and treasures. Four years later Ruth, who has returned East, invites Jack to come and see her, and tells him to bring along that roommate of his that he has written is such a good fellow. What is her surprise to find that it is Swiftfoot who is at college with Jack. She tells Jack the story of the accident. While doing so, Swiftfoot sees through the mirror in an adjoining room the two sweethearts kiss, and sees that he has no chance to win Ruth's love, so decides to return to his people. His tribe, however, refuse to welcome one of their number who has become civilized, and he wanders off to the spot where he rescued Ruth. He pulls out the dried rose, and looking at it he sees a picture of Ruth struggling in the torrent for her life. Without hesitation he dives from the precipice deep into the roaring rapids, never to appear agan.

BLASTED HOPES.—The gold-crowned fields of yellow, teeming with sparkling Autumn dew, furnishes a background for planning of life's young dream and with the too frequent result of blasted hopes. Sallie is a conventional country lass yet in her teens—who was fond of her childhood sweetheart, Jasper, but one night a hunting party, finding their auto short of gasoline, drew up to the little farm house and asked for accommodations until they could send to the city for gasoline. Jim, the spokesman of the party, being more friendly, as it was he who first met Sallie in the corn field and through her directions found the father and bargained with him to pull his machine to the farm house for the night. Sallie entertains her guests with the family organ and soon all repair to their rooms, except Jim, who had quietly arranged to meet Sallie outside, presumably to take a smoke before retiring.

They are seen strolling in the moonlight. A little band of gold is placed upon her finger and to the simple country girl a new life has opened up, and Jasper is no longer a serious consideration in her mind. On taking his departure the next morning, Jim presses firmly in her hand a note giving his city address and saying he would return and ask her father's consent for her hand. But Jim was an adept at making promises and equally so in breaking them and was in two months' time married to his fiancee in the city—and poor Sallie was to him as a page torn from the calendar of remembrance. She runs away from the quiet little home to the big city and tries to find Jim. Finding his address, she is informed he is not in the city. She patiently awaits his return, her money almost gone. Upon her return to the office, she finds him in and a smile lights up her troubled face, but only doomed to gloom, for she is confronted by his wife and faints from the shock.

Upon being revived she wends her way to the public park to seek solace in silence and solitude. Jim, joy riding, is attracted and hastens to aid the suffering woman, when he discovers it is Sallie. Remorse is plainly visible in his face as the poor confiding girl is borne away. The scene carries us back to the little farm, where ma and pa are sitting alone, waiting and praying for their little girl until restless slumber had closed their eyes.

OH, YOU SKELETON.—Now, girls, if you turned suddenly around and found a nice, gentlemanly skeleton seated comfortably beside you, would you scream or be too frightened to utter a sound? Now Martha, the new maid of all work, employed in a medical college, was content to wash pans in the kitchen but when she had to live with the cold remains of a poor mortal, she lets out a noise that would fish the vessel of a moving picture machine into motion—and scares from the room only to be confronted by another and another, until Martha is a regular contortion of all that is frightful. Composing herself enough, she summons the officers who are led to believe something horrible on a massive scale occurred, and hasten to the scene. The appearance of the skeleton cools their ardor and dampens the courage of the bloodhounds and they join the merry stampede. Martha hits a street car for the tall and small, but our friend the skeleton holes up again and a large hole in the car window marks the maid's hasty exit. Seeking refuge from her Nemesis, she lands in a room with no visible skeleton, but the news was too good to be true and poor Martha finds it necessary to imitate Halley's comet and on the window marks her course, landing on a steep roof, tumbles into the bathing tank below and is only rescued with difficulty. Poor Martha had a hard time and has never reconciled herself to the association of skeletons.

GHOST OF THE OVEN. Hilda was the bakery girl, with a sweetheart who was not altogether welcome on account of Hilda's employer, who objected to his visits. In order to secrete her lover from the baker, who was coming, she hides him in a cold oven, but forgets to hide the tin pail that the beer came in, and a mouse is scented and poor Hilda lost the job and the boss baker hires Hans to take her place; also orders a fire built under the cold furnace. The boy helper, remonstrating, finally tells him there is a man hid there. The boss at once sees the situation and goes for material for the fire. The sweetheart, overhearing this, makes his escape to the flour bin. The fire is built, but upon examination he finds the bird has flown. Determined not to be outdone, a few old bones are gotten from the cast-off scraps and placed in the oven and Hilda sent for. The boss having had a good laugh at her expense, is just preparing to go fishing over Sunday and accordingly locks the flour bin and repairs to the country to angle for the finny tribe. Upon his return Monday, he finds the new baker on the job and prepares to fill up the bin. In a moment of their absence the lover escapes back to the oven, only to be compelled to confront his executioners, who are amazed and exit pell mell to the street. An excited chase ensues.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

AULD ROBIN GREY.—Young Jamie loved a lassie and she loved him. His love was strong but his purse was weak, and so he went to sea to make his fortune with which to claim the lassie as his bride. The good ship "Ben Lomond" bore him away, and while he was on the seas the lassie's father had his arm broken, when the gypsies stole their cow and the mother of the lassie was taken sick.

They were poor folk and the lassie was obliged to spin and weave, keep the house, care for her father and nurse her mother. "Auld Robin Grey," a friend of the family, generous and true, aids them in the time of their need and kindly bestows his beneficence whenever he can do so without pretension or obtrusion. He likes the father and the mother, but he loves the daughter.

He asks her to marry him. Her parents favor good old Robin Grey, but the daughter still loves Jamie, and she cannot give heart and hand to another.

Men must work and women must weep, but it seems the poor lassie must do both, for it is not long before there is great sorrow and excitement among the town folk. The ship "Ben Lomond" is announced as wrecked, with Jamie and all on board lost. They try to keep the news from Jenny, but bad news travels quickly, and despite Robin Grey's efforts to have the shock come to her as gently as possible she sees the bulletin posted on the outside of the ship chandler's and is supported from falling by her faithful friend Robin.

Giving up her Jamie as gone to a watery grave, she is urged to marry Robin Grey, while her heart is at the bottom of the sea. Robin proves a good husband and she tries to be a good wife to him, although she does not love him.

Like one from the dead Jamie escapes the wreck and comes back to claim Jennie's hand and heart. She can scarcely believe she sees aright, and she is not easily convinced that her Jamie is alive and talking to her, and when she does realize it she tells him she is the wife of "Auld Robin Grey," and he is a good man and she will do her best to be a faithful wife to him. Jamie and she kiss and then part from each other, to go their own ways as their consciences direct.

DAVY JONES' DOMESTIC TROUBLES.—Married to a "virago," Davy wishes himself at the bottom of the sea with his namesake McGinty. His wife possesses a comely personality, but, by the great horn spoon, she has a temper like a whirlwind that spouts up and swamps the whole matrimonial ship at the slightest provocation, and poor Davy doesn't have a leg to stand on.

Captain Bragg, an old friend of Davy's, calls to see him and finds Annie (Mrs. Jones) very attractive, and remarks that "she has a dem fine figger-head for any man's craft." Davy replies that's

AMERICAN.

ROMANTIC REDSKINS. Two old chiefs, Eagle Eye and War Scar, of time honored tribes, and close neighbors and friends, had each a beautiful daughter, that of Eagle Eye being Minette, while the daughter of War Scar was called Felette. Now these old chaps were most jealous of their daughters, guarding them with rigorous care against the efforts of the loverlorn youth to capture the susceptible maidens. Two young braves of neighboring tribes came many miles in their bark canoes to ask for the daughters in marriage. Baptiste Loves Minette and asks her hand of War Scar. Both chiefs are obdurate. The girls are heartbroken. The young braves determine to win the girls and depart. The old chiefs, after a conference decide to each marry the other's daughter and so keep them for all time. With threats and whipping they drag them before the mission priest, Father McCann, who, upon seeing the true state of affairs, sends them off about their business, refusing to marry them.

The wily old chiefs then conceive the scheme of taking their tents and belongings, including the girls, to a desolate island, and there, by starving, strive to force them into subjection. The poor girls are in an extreme state of suffering and despair when the young lovers discover the place of isolation and run to the old priest for counsel. They come upon him as he is striving with laudanum drops and whiskey to allay a jumping toothache. The youths tell their story. A merry twinkle dances in the eyes of the dear old fellow, as he thinks of a plan to help the love-sick youngsters. He puts the drops into the bottle of whiskey and, knowing the craze of the Indian for the fire water, gives it to the twain with instructions to see that the old men drink it and while they sleep insensibly to "steal the daughters and bring them to me." The boys depart full of hope and adventure, while our friend Father McCann forgets the agony of his sore tooth.

The lovers reach the island, surprise the girls, who soon enter into the plot. The old men get the bottle and without waiting explanations as to how it came there, are soon in a highly hilarious state followed by deep, unwakable sleep. The youngsters, to get doubly even, take not only their daughters, but their tepees, canoes, and all their possessions, leaving them marooned.

Father McCann marries them and gives them his blessing and then we see them happy in their own tepees living as they should live, in love and happiness, with the conditions reversed, the men caring for and waiting upon their wives. Upon the island the two old reprobate chiefs, having recovered from their debauch, are holding their heads and crying and sobbing and scolding, each accusing the other of being the cause of all their present misery.

ATLAS.

TURNING OF THE WORM.—Judith was the usual, the everyday type, that has always predominated—the trembling, cringing, pleading woman who humbly submitted herself in all things to her lord and master. Her husband, big, brutal and selfish, made her life one of abject misery and torment. He evinced a particular hatred of his mother-in-law and took every occasion to wound his wife's feelings in respect to her.

Judith worked hard all day tidying up the house, thinking to please John when he returned home in the evening. Once, strange to say, he entered the door with a smile, the first she she had seen in weeks, but only for an instant. His glance rested on a picture of Judith's mother which she had unconsciously placed on an easel in a conspicuous place. Stamping like an enraged bull he emitted a torrent of abuse, and tearing the picture from the easel demanded to know why he must everlastingly be confronted with that hated face. "Man must rule and not woman" he exclaimed, and suiting the action to the word he produced from the mantel a picture of his father and placed it on the easel instead.

Judith accidentally reads Ella Willow Wheelcock's "Advice to Abused Women" and decides to follow it at the first opportunity. About this time, mother-in-law arrives for a long visit. She is met at the door by John and promptly kicked down the steps and warned to stay away. Judith seizes the opportunity she has been waiting for, and wades into her brute hubby with such fire and zeal as to literally take him off his feet with wonder and amazement. She teaches him a lesson he will not forget and he finally agrees "The new woman" in his household had come to stay.

THAT DOG GONE DOG.—Willie is sent to the butcher to buy some dog meat for his father's pet mastiff. Two blocks away he came upon a crowd of excited urchins and stopped to whet his curiosity. It developed that a crap game was in progress, the youngsters eagerly trying to win marbles, pennies and other trinkets from each other. Remembering his father's admonition to "hurry back" Willie bravely marched on to the butcher shop and made his purchase, the butcher reminding him that the meat was not intended for human consumption but dogs only.

Returning by the same street, Willie forgets his good intentions of a few moments before and stops to watch the game which is still in progress. His interest waxes stronger and stronger until he finally takes a hand himself, depositing his package of meat on a nearby hydrant.

A hungry tramp, attracted by the confusion happens by and scents the meat. Cautiously he steals away with the package and uses a tramp's ingenuity to prepare a tasty meal.

Our knight of the road soon begins to cut capers under the influence of his canine diet. Through the streets he ran on all fours, wowing and yelping like a dog. Pandemonium breaks loose and the town turns out en masse to capture this strange freak of humanity. Luckily the dog catcher hoves in sight and is immediately pressed into service.

With the aid of his net a capture is effected and our dog man is hustled off in the dog catcher's wagon.

CAPITOL FILM CO.

A SHOT IN THE NIGHT. Nellie Dent lives in the country with her blind father. She is engaged to the young farmer at the next farm. A man from the city annoys her with his attentions and is punished by the farmer. As the girl and the blind man live alone, the farmer gives them his rifle, telling them that a shot from it will be heard by him and bring him at once if they ever need help at night.

The city man determines to obtain possession of Nellie by force. He comes to the house, seizes the girl, who is sitting with the blind man, and puts her in his auto and speeds away. The blind man hears the struggle, calls to his child, knows that she is in danger, and is in despair at his own helplessness. He remembers the rifle, and, groping his way to it, fires a shot. The young farmer hears the shot that tells him he is needed, and leaping on a horse dashes to the blind man's home.

The blind man tells of the struggle he has heard and the farmer dashes down the road after the auto. The auto speeding along the country road breaks down. The young farmer arrives on the scene and there is a struggle between the two men. The farmer wins out, and putting the girl on the horse takes her back to the little home, where the blind man is anxiously awaiting them.

CHAMPION.

CAUGHT BY COWBOYS.—Mona Semple refuses Bob Thornby, the ticket agent, as gently as possible, for, though she does not love him, she rather likes him. The same disappointment is accorded John Wilbur, following his proposal to her upon her return to the ranch from the station.

With her refusal of John, however, she tempers encouragement because she likes John more than Bob. Still she doesn't say "yes" to either of them.

Bob and John have been chums, until the affair with Mona made them enemies; a natural frequency for two men loving the same girl, despite the strongest bond of friendship existing previously. Moreover, when the disappointment is keen, it will serve to ignite the latent spark of innate evil smouldering in the breast of the rejected one. Such is the case with Bob Thornby.

Ranchman Semple having sold a great number of cattle, sends Mona with the money to the express office to be placed in the safe until sent on to the bank. The station, usually filled with cowboys happens to be empty of all but the agent Bob, who again presses his attentions upon the girl. She refuses him so emphatically this time, that he grows threatening and surly; so much so that she becomes alarmed and endeavors to take up the money and leave the office.

But, Thornby, anticipating her move, and realizing that he is in for it whichever way the wind blows, seizes her, binds her to a chair, writes a note implicating John Wilbur, pins it to her waist, and then, grabbing up the money, mounts the girl's horse and dashes off toward the canyon.

Meanwhile John has seen Mona riding toward the station, and thinking she was going to see the agent, but not knowing her mission, he jealously presumes her visit is a friendly one. He mounts his horse and follows her.

Arriving at the depot he sees Thornby riding away on Mona's horse, and hurrying into the office, discovers the bound girl, releases her, and takes her home upon his own horse.

Leaving her in the care of her parents he hurries to the outhouse and soon a crowd of cowboys are on the trail of the fleeing agent. They find the horse returning riderless. Dashing on they discover Thornby climbing the rocks of a steep canyon. Firing into the air more to alarm him than to hit him, they endeavor to bring him down. In the frenzy of desperation the agent turns and empties his revolver at the cowboys who return his fire. One of the bullets strikes him on the arm, causing him to relax his hold whereupon he slides down into the arms of the cowboys below who immediately secure him.

Upon their arrival at the ranch they learn of the note implicating John in the theft but none give it credence. They are all for peremptorily finishing Thornby, but the rancher intercedes and gives him one hour to get out of town. Then he gives his daughter to Wilbur with his blessings.

GREAT NORTHERN.

WHO IS SHE? A husband discovers his wife is unfaithful, and casts her off. One of the children is taken ill, and the wife tries to see the sick child, but her husband refuses to let her enter. Broken hearted, she goes to America, where she gets into bad company. She shoots a man who wants to blackmail her son, now a rising man. She is tried for murder, and refuses to give any information regarding herself to the judge, as she is afraid it might get to her son's ears. Great is her horror when she finds that the man who is to defend her at the trial is her own son. She also recognizes her husband, who has come to the court to see his son conduct the case. The young barrister, without knowing that it is his own mother he is defending, pleads for her so well that she is acquitted. The husband relents, as his wife is dying, and tells his son that he has been defending his own mother, who dies in the arms of her long lost son.

ECLAIR.

THE MANUACTURE OF CHEESE AT ROQUEFORT. We first beheld the wonderful scene of thousands upon thousands of sheep, peacefully grazing upon the verdant hillocks. Led by their shepherds, we see them taken down into the valley where the great cheese dairy is situated. There the milking takes place, after which we see all the various manipulations to which the milk is subjected in the making of the famous Roquefort cheese. At the end of all the operations, the cheeses are triumphantly loaded on immense automobile-wagons, and taken to the station, where they are distributed to all parts of the world.

LITTLE MOTHER. The child of a marquis breaks one of her numerous dolls, and is sent with a bank note to buy another. She stops to look at a Punch and Judy show, which is worked by a poor woman whom we have previously seen wearily making her preparations for the show. All goes merrily until the doll's actions gradually flag, and come to a full stop, and running behind, the crowd, the child included, discover that the old woman has fallen in a faint. In the poor woman's baby, the little girl sees a doll better than she ever hoped to have, and carries it off, leaving the note with which she was to purchase a new toy with the sick woman. At home the child attends devotedly to the baby, and sends a note to the poor woman in hospital, saying that the baby will be well taken care of until she is well, by a "Little Mother." Convalescence leads to the discharge of the baby's mother, and she comes to claim the child. The little master is not disposed to relinquish her charge, and his father offers to adopt the orphan for his daughter's sake, and engage the mother as nurse, and the offer is gladly accepted, much to the joy of all concerned.

CINES.

TONTOLINI IS IN LOVE.—Our delightful friend, Tontolini, makes his appearance once more! This time he is head over heels in love with a charming chorus girl, to whom Tontolini's ardent devotion is a source of much amusement. Our optimistic friend, however, refuses to give way to despair, and in order to be near the idol of his heart, he obtains employment as fireman in the theater at which the chorus girl is engaged. As ill luck will have it, a fire breaks out; poor, smitten Tontolini is so intent upon the performance of his lady-love, that when the call to duty comes, he loses his head entirely. Seizing a hose, he hurriedly proceeds to administer a chilly shower-bath to any one and anything in his immediate vicinity; even his own beloved does not escape. So ends the love affair of ill-fated Tontolini!

THE PRETTY DAIRY-MAID.—A young and pretty peasant girl forgets and despises the ardent and honest love of a young shepherd, having listened too much to the delicate phrases of love made to her by a rich and elegant gentleman.

The poor, neglected boy's heart is wrung by the girl's cruelty, and he shows his grief too openly; the servants of the young lord consider this a piece of affrontery, and they make this an excuse of handling the young shepherd roughly.

This act of the servants of the nobleman draws her attention once more to her former lover, and the pretty dairy-maid is smitten at the sight of her lover, suffering, despairing, insulted, and she repents of her unkind treatment of him; she nurses him and consoles him, and finally consents to be his wife.

The young lord becomes remorseful, when he sees the happiness he would have destroyed, and shows his repentance by taking under his protection, the newly married couple.

IMP

WILLIE.—William Hammond, a wealthy city merchant, receives a letter from his brother in the rural districts, introducing his son "Willie." Mr. Hammond's namesake, and requesting him to make a man of him, as he is very young and unsophisticated and has no chance to improve in the country.

The servant who brings in the letter, informing Mr. Hammond that "Willie" is waiting in the reception room, is ordered to show him in at once and the Hammond family, not having kept in close touch with their relatives and believing Willie to be a gawky little boy in knee trousers laughingly prepare to receive him.

Then "Willie" is ushered in and gazes smilingly about him at his astounded relations for "Willie" is over six feet in height and although wearing "store clothes" is not one bit bashful.

In shaking hands with his cousin, Jack, he gives his hand a squeeze that remains with him for some time and in conversation with his cousin Ethel, he gives her "a severe slap on the wrist."

Mr. Hammond soon supplies "Willie" with suitable garments and he and Jack start right in to give him a course of instructions in various manly accomplishments.

They teach him to play poker and he cleans them out; Jack gives him a boxing lesson and is taught several points in the game himself, and taking "Willie" out for an evening with Bacchus, is led home in a highly inebriated condition by his country cousin, who is none the worse for his sundry libations.

To cap the climax, this innocent country youth makes violent love to Jack's sweetheart, Clara, a young heiress, and when Jack "butts in" in defense of his rights, "Willie" rushes him out of the room and returns to his love making. The young couple finally elope and return to announce their marriage, "handing" the family the surprise of their lives and filling Jack's manly bosom with the most poignant, but vain regrets.

THE IDOL'S EYE.—A weird story of a large diamond abstracted from an image of Buddah and which is followed around the world by a Hindu in his efforts to recover it and return it to its rightful place.

The sailor who removed it from the temple in India is finally found in a dying condition in the United States and is conveyed to the home of a physician, who, with the assistance of another medical man, attempts to resuscitate him. By the side of the sailor had been found a bottle which contains an unknown poison, which the physicians attempt to analyze in order to procure a proper antidote, but being unsuccessful, the man dies. Before dying, however, he reaches in his bosom and brings forth a chamois skin bag containing the diamond, which he has had set in a bracelet. This he presents to one of the physicians.

The doctor, in turn, presents the bracelet to his young wife. The Hindu having failed to take the diamond from the sailor has lingered about the doctor's home and through a window has seen the sailor give him the jewel. He then, through letters of introduction, meets the doctor and his wife at a reception and observing the bracelet on her arm, tells her where it came from. Before he can tell her more, he is interrupted by the entrance of the husband an dhis physician friend, who are going home.

That night, as she is removing her wraps in her bedroom, she is startled by the sudden entrance of the Hindu through a large window. He goes to her quietly and informs her that he must have the diamond at once. She attempts to escape from him, but he prevents her and renews his demand. She, in great fear, removes the bracelet from her wrist and hands it to him. The Hindu then gives her, in exchange, a beautiful pearl necklace and is just placing it about her neck, when her husband enters unobserved by either of them. He is horrified at the sight and believing the worst of his wife, quietly withdraws and staggers away heartbroken. The Hindu then leaves as he entered.

The husband, seated in his study crushed by the blow he had just received, notices the bottle of poison left on his table after the death of the sailor and decides to use it as the means of escaping from his sorrow. He therefore makes his last will and testament leaving everything to his wife, and drinks half of the contents of the bottle which taking immediate effect, he falls heavily.

The noise of his fall brings his wife to his side, who summons the other physician. This doctor, who had suspicions regarding the Hindu and has been watching the house now appears with two servants dragging the Hindu with them, he having been captured in trying to make his escape.

Going to the side of his dying confrere, the physician noticing the half empty bottle and reading the will, comprehends the situation at once and rushing back to the Hindu, demands the antidote. The Hindu sneeringly tells him there is none. In order to test the truth of this statement, the doctor, with the assistance of the servants, starts to force the bottle between the teeth of the Hindu and thus compel him to take a dose of his own poison. This terrifies the Hindu to such an extent, that he begs for mercy and reaching into his pocket produces a small vial which he hands to the doctor with the necessary directions.

The poisoned physician's life is saved by means of this antidote and the Hindu is thrown off the premises. Of course, the wife explains to the husband the scene in her bedroom and the harmony between them is restored.

And the grim likeness of Buddah is again bedecked with its baleful eye.

NESTOR.

REV. JOHN WRIGHT OF MISSOURI.—At Rolling Forks, Big Bill reigned supreme. It was, therefore, with a feeling of admiration, not unmixed with awe, that Sadie beheld a stranger commanding Bill to leave her alone. The stranger proved to be a traveling evangelist, Rev. John Wright of Missouri, who was forced to knock the bully down ere Sadie could be permitted to lead her intoxicated father away.

Quickly scrambling to his feet, Big Bill demanded satisfaction. John Wright, however, declared himself unarmed; but the other eagerly proposed to fight it out with nature's weapons. So, realizing that this was the only way to hold his own with the boys, the evangelist consented.

The bully and his pal, Texas Joe, were jubilant—but not for long. Young Wright was an expert boxer, and, before the others had time to realize what was happening, Bill had been knocked out completely.

This was his first step. The next was to persuade Sadie's father, old man Allen, to sign the pledge; after which he made slow but steady strides with the others. All this was wormwood to Bill and his partner; something must be done at once!

At last the conspirators agreed upon what they deemed the quickest and surest way of ridding themselves of their enemy. They would spread disguise and declare that, in accidentally looking the report that the evangelist was a horsethief in over Wright's shoulder, Bill had seen a letter of warning sent to him by an old pal. For evidence this letter was to be slipped into their victim's pocket, or his Bible, and the boys, upon finding it, would do the rest.

Accordingly, the bully and his henchman hastened to the post-office to make sure that the evangelist called that day, and, seeing that he actually received several letters, Bill quickly penned the note and hastened after him.

The unsuspecting clergyman gladly handed over his Bible when the conspirator asked to see it; and, until the boys bore down upon him and snatched the false note, John Wright had been congratulating himself upon his latest convert.

Unfortunately for Big Bill and Texas Joe, so preoccupied had they been in planning the evangelist's letter that neither saw that Sadie was covertly watching them at the post-office. She, however, not only overheard the greater part of their conversation, but also secured the blotter which the men had used and the half sheet torn from the letter.

Running breathlessly to her home, the girl held the blotter up to a mirror, then, sending her father after the sheriff, she hastened after the bully, and arrived not a moment too soon; already the rope around Wright's neck was fastened to Andy's saddle; but just as he raised his whip to send the horse galloping over the hills, Sadie, Allen and the sheriff appeared to turn the tide.

When at last Big Bill and Texas Joe were released, they crept out of the State and were heard of no more in that part of the country—while Rolling Forks, with the clergyman as its leading spirit, settled down to peace and prosperity.

YANKEE

ITALIAN SHERLOCK HOLMES.—An Italian adventurer, posing as a nobleman arrives in New York accompanied by a beautiful woman who is introduced to society as the Countess Zingara. They are received in the most exclusive society circles and arrange to secure invitations to a grand ball given by a wealthy Italian banker in honor of a visiting foreign ambassador. When festivities are at their height, the banker's wife discovers the loss of a valuable necklace of pearls, valued at twenty-five thousand dollars.

Her husband, desiring to avoid a scandal and not wishing to mar the pleasure of his guests, quietly telephones the Central Street Service bureau for a trusted man. Petrosio, the famous Italian sleuth is assigned the case and he immediately calls at the banker's home where he is introduced as a foreign Count. Meanwhile, Murrillo, the adventurer, drops the stolen necklace to confederates outside, and in doing so notices a quantity of dust on his coat sleeve leaving the imprint of his arm on the window sill. Petrosio is quick to notice the arm of Murrillo and detects an expression of alarm on the face of his beautiful companion.

Adopting various disguises first as the cabby who drives the suspected pair from the ball, and later as an express man, Petrosio is successful in collecting a mass of damaging evidence against the suspects.

When about to arrest Murrillo and the fake Countess, Petrosio is taken unaware by them but his life is saved by an Italian girl in the confidence of Murrillo, who falls in love with him and takes his place in the large gunny sack which is to be thrown into the East river. Petrosio arrives at the dock with a reinforcement of blue coats in time to save the girl whom he takes to his home and cares for.

LUX FILMS.

BEWITCHED.—During a conjuring entertainment, the magician borrows a silk hat, and forthwith produces the usual conjuror's stock-in-trade—ducks, pigeons, rabbits, etc. With a bow he hands the hat back to its owner, who shortly afterwards, leaves. As he walks away his hat takes a leap and gently bowls off down the street. It is captured at last, and our friend's troubles begin. He meets various people and on each occasion, as he raises his hat, chickens, rabbits and pigeons -to say nothing of plants, spring out. Unkindly enough the gentleman's friends quickly depart, leaving him bewildered. The climax comes when visiting a lady's house and waiting for its fair occupant. As our friend, hat in hand, looks round, a small statue together with the hat, suddenly disappears, and the gentleman is not long in following its example.

SHE REQUIRED STRENGTH AND GOT IT.—An old woman, wheeling a barrow, comes across a vendor of patent medicines, selling "Lux" tonic which is guaranteed according to the "quack" to return strength and energy. The woman listens open-mouthed and quietly taking a bottle, swallows its contents at one gulp. The tonic acts suddenly. Wheeling the barrow round, the woman literally flies off, overturning everybody in her way, policemen, harmless individuals, articles of furniture—all are carried before her until she finishes her wild career by smashing in a wall of a house, and the film closes upon a scene of wild confusion.

WHERE YOU GO, I GO.—The partners in a firm are somewhat at loggerheads, and the younger one takes advantage of his corpulent partner's attention to his business to slip out and visit some friends. But his absence is quickly discovered, and to prevent the possibility of his again disappearing, the two partners' coat sleeves are sewn together. Soon the fun commences. A pretty client is shown in, and soon discovers that both men are practically inseparable—what one does so the other is also bound to do. As she leaves them the younger one slips through his coat and dashes after her. Determined not to be outdone, the other forces an operation upon his most unwilling partner, and now firmly joined the two wander off. At that moment the pretty client appears, and as she gets into a carriage she is quickly followed by the young man, and the carriage starting, the corpulent partner is forced to most unwillingly run by the side. After falling into a river and being rescued they are at length released by a collision, and the young man at once dashes off, leaving his partner disconsolate.

DEFENDER

A CLAUSE IN THE WILL.—Hiram Morton dies and leaves his granddaughter a legacy, provided she marries within a stipulated time. She is pestered by fortune hunters, all of whom she sends to the discard, until she receives a little note from her lawyer informing her that if she is not married by the next day her fortune is forfeited. Deciding to get anybody to marry her and later rid herself of him, she journeys forth in her touring car to find the "he." She does—meets a chap with a tale in his eyes of departed refinement and manliness, one who has hit the down-grade and descended with it. She promises him $500 if he will marry her and then allow her to sue for divorce. They marry, he is given the money and with it a blow from which he never recovers—a dart from Cupid more fatal than his original stab from cupidity, and he resolves to take the $500, go West, make a man of only the semblance of one, and woo her who had sued him. He goes West, obtains a position as ranchman on a ranch, the daughter of whose owner he had saved from death. By sheer dint of effort and loyalty, he acquires an interest in the business. Then to the ranch comes a girl from the East, niece of the owner. She meets the clean-cut junior partner, and proceeds to trip into love with him. And the self made junior partner recognizes in the girl—you've guessed it—none other than his wife and—a coincidence that is so rare in these enlightened days—his sweetheart. He reveals himself to her, shows her a photo of her which he had taken after their marriage, and under the old trees of an older earth two souls whom some great Director had destined to be joined, are reunited in deed as well as in form.

SOLAX

THE SERGEANT'S DAUGHTER.—A strong picture dealing with the Philippines, the Army and the Navy. A romance of two continents, beautifully told with the aid of the famous Solax photography. The opening scene of thousands of troops on a man-of-war makes for the success of this wonderful film. The romance begins between an officer of the Army and a Philippine girl. The scene changes quickly to the United States. The return of the officer to the Philippines effects this result that the Philippine sweetheart of the officer and his American sweetheart are brought face to face in a wonderful climax.

A CHILD'S SACRIFICE.—A very naturally told story of an eight year old daughter of a workman who is on strike. The mother falls sick and has no money in the house to buy medicine prescribed by the visiting doctor. The little girl, discovering this, starts out to sell her doll, and by a strange coincidence meets the owner of the factory where her father is on strike. She finally sells the doll to a storekeeper, but the employer, seeing her sad face and winsome way, immediately purchases the doll and returns it to her. The closing scenes of the strike and the intervention of the little girl preventing bloodshed bring about a happy sequel to a pathetic story.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

YOUNG LORD STANLEY. Lord Stanley disinherits his only son, Jack, because he refuses to marry his cousin, the Lady Maude. Jack comes to America out of funds, and having no business training, accepts a position as groom in the establishment of a wealthy American.

Jack soon falls in love with Ann, the daughter of the house, and when his affection is discovered by Ann's father, Jack is ordered off the place. When his fortunes are at their lowest ebb, Jack receives news that his father has passed away, and just before his death, in a spirit of forgiveness, willed him his entire fortune.

Introduced by his lawyer, who happens to be an old friend of Ann's father, Jack once more enters the home in which he has been employed, but this time bearing his rightful title. Ann, who has been urged by her father to win the affections of young Lord Stanley, who is reputed to be very rich, is prepared to treat him coldly. Upon finding, however, that the young Lord is no other than the groom who won her heart, she gives Jack quite a different sort of reception.

THE FAIRIES' HALLOWE'EN.—Marie is the tiny daughter of a well-to-do farmer. On Hallowe'en her father, to amuse her, picks the pumpkin that she selects, and fashions a Jack O'Lantern out of it. Her new toy pleases the child immensely, and at once takes a place in her affections equal to that held by her dollie. So it is natural that she should be thinking about the two of them when she is tucked into bed and falls asleep.

Perhaps that was why the Queen of the Fairies came to her and invited her to a Hallowe'en party that her loyal subjects were giving in their woodland retreat. And so that Marie would be perfectly happy, and not feel embarrassed among strangers, the Queen asked Dollie and Pumpkin to be her guests also. And, as a further mark of favor, she waved her wand, and Dollie and Pumpkin could run around and talk as well as Marie could. This certainly made it more enjoyable for the little girl.

A Fairy Hallowe'en party is one of the finest things going in the amusement line, and only very nice and very good little girls are invited to them. As Marie filled these requirements, she had a perfectly glorious time, but was inclined to weep when she woke up later in her own little bed, and found that her toys had lost their miraculous gift of life. But it consoled her somewhat to have them, for they served as reminders of her wonderful evening. And perhaps the fairies will ask her to attend another party later. If they do, she has decided that Pumpkin and Dollie must have their share of the good times as before.

You've got Gen. Flimco looking in every direction at once, Mr. Exhibitor—so keep at him! The amount of business he has lost in the past few weeks reaches a staggering total, not only in dollars and cents but in the number of exhibitors who have asserted their Independence. And every dollar and every exhibitor adds just that much strength to the already powerful Independent Cause. If any of you are still on the fence, for heaven's sake let me show you the quality of films I am buying heavily from the Independent manufacturers. Let me give you a film service that will tickle your box office.

TESTIMONIALS:

I wish to compliment you on your excellent Western releases. I can always feature Champion Films.—Geo. E. Chamberlain, Portland, Ore.

2.

Mr. C. E. Herbold of The Acme Theater, New Castle, Pa., is advertising Champion Day in the daily paper. He's not doing it for us either. He's doing it because he knows it will draw the crowd.

3.

Your Western pictures are well liked by all who attend this theater, and I will ask you to send me pictures of your players, so I can put them in our theater lobby.—George Wadsworth, Mgr. Star Theater, Hartford, Conn.

4.

Will say again "Champions lead them all."—Carl L. Baer, Duluth, Minn.

5.

6.

Well, the Champs are going fine. These boys are enthusiastic over your Western stuff. Keep on that Western track and your fortune is at hand. You will have them looping the loop pretty soon.—Eugene Cline, 59 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

7.

Your films are great. Kindly put my house on your mailing list.—H. C. Farley, Empire Theater, Montgomery, Ala.

8.

In your advertising you state, "What Did You Think of That Pippa, A Western Girl's Sacrifice"?

Say, old man, I can't help it. I must write and tell you I not only took in $20 more than I did the previous week, but am ahead so far to-day that I think I will break the record. Say, your Western subjects are simply great. My patrons speak of them as even better than the B——.

You surely are to be complimented on the finish of the film. That curtain effect is great, it gets a hand every time it goes through the machine. It is one of the cutest stunts yet pulled off by the manufacturers of Independent Films. Wishing you all kinds of success.—Wm. G. Spurrier, Savoy Theater Co., Seattle, Wash.

I wish to congratulate you for the high standard which your subjects have attained and assure you they have gained great favor with the exhibitors.—Arthur A. Schmidt, Mgr. Victor Film Service, Cleveland, O.

10.

We must advise for your credit that the films you are now issuing are receiving many comments and you may use this letter as a recommendation if you so desire.—C. H. Scherer, Bijou Film & Amus. Co., Kansas City, Mo.

CAUGHT

The whole country has caught the pass-word, that means increase in receipts. "Champs," here's one for Wednesday, Nov. 2.

Caught By Cowboys

One, long, grand, sensational thrill that carries with it a charm, that is intensified by the most magnificent photography ever achieved. Spectacular settings that brought two pages of laudatory comments in European journals and we need not talk about our home papers—they're in ecstasy over it.

A Great Proposition for Showmen After BIG MONEY

We offer you EXCLUSIVE EXHIBITION RIGHTS for an EXCLUSIVE SET of FEATURE FILMS which will turn you in the BIGGEST PROFITS you ever earned. These reels contain FEATURES never before produced on film.

Did you ever see a "Wild Horse Race"? A team of Buffalo broken and driven to harness? A Calf Branding Contest?

Did you ever see any of these in any so-called Wild West Show? Certainly not, for the reason that these features are of the Real West and not the Imitation West. And these are only some of the features that make the "COWBOY and INDIAN FRONTIER FILMS" better than any other Western Films ever produced.

Besides—the pictures of COL. THEODORE ROOSEVELT contained in our reels are absolutely the best pictures of AMERICA'S GREATEST CITIZEN ever produced on Moving Picture Film and make this set of Frontier Films invaluable.

CAN YOU GET THIS FEATURE IN ANY OTHER WESTERN FILM?

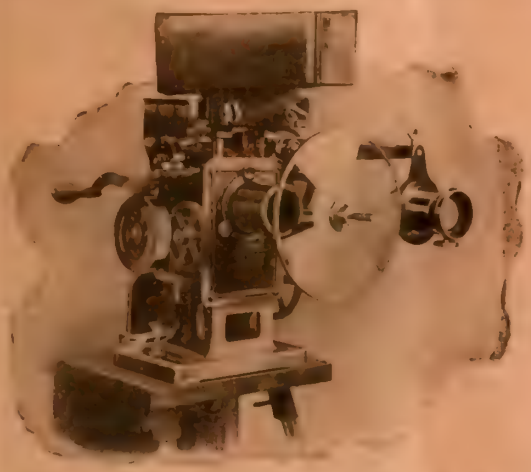
THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD

THE ORGAN OF THE PHOTOPLAY AND ALLIED INTERESTS

NEW YORK

Power's Cameragraph No. 6



The Perfect Motion Picture Machine

Wins in competition with the leading makes of the World.

Messrs. W. J. Morgan and J. A. Hayden, of the J. D. Williams Amusement Company, Sydney, Australia, came to New York for the purpose of securing the Australian agency for Power's moving picture machines. Negotiations were concluded and an order placed for fifty No. 6 machines for immediate shipment.

Heretofore, European machines have been in the majority in that country, with a few installations of American-made machines.

This order was not placed hastily, or without weighing carefully the mechanical features of the machine and the flickerless, steady pictures projected by it. When so far away from the source of supplies, a breakdown is fatal. Substantial construction and reliability count for much more than they do in this country, where supplies can be quickly obtained.

Six months ago, two Power's Cameragraphs No. 6 were shipped to them, and their wonderfully strong and enduring construction, especially the new and original form of intermittent movement which does away with the delicate star wheel and pin wheel, created a profound impression.

As soon as the machines could be carefully tested and given a practical demonstration in Sydney's leading theater, Mr. J. D. Williams cabled for the Australian agency, negotiations for which have just been concluded as stated above.

It should be a source of great pride to all American exhibitors and operators that the genius of Mr. Nicholas Power has produced a machine which is acknowledged to be the perfection of mechanical construction, and is the choice of particular exhibitors throughout the world.

We quote as follows from an advertisement of the J. D. Williams Amusement Company, which appeared in "The Referee," the leading newspaper of Sydney, Australia, September 21, 1910:

"We have the largest consignment of picture machines now on the water that ever came to Australia. We are the sole and exclusive agents for the POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH, a picture machine that has always been the best ever since the picture business has been in existence. We are positive of this fact, and to make good we will sell one of these machines on one week's trial, and if they don't give satisfaction in every way, return them, and they will not cost you one penny. After a competition in our exhibit room with five other picture machines, six of the best moving picture operators in Sydney pronounced the Power's machine to be absolutely the best machine in the world."

THE THANHOUSER 2-A-WEEK

Say "THANHOUSER" to the Exchange Man and You'll Get

That Feature of a Fire Film!

RELEASED TUESDAY, NOV. 4

The Little Fire Chief

is assuredly a feature picture for it features a bunch of "smoke eaters," their daring young chief and his cute little friend "The Thanhouser Kid." THE COMBINATION IS A WINNER! In this you have a sure-fire hit that'll startle the grown-ups and simply stun the "kids." A GOOD story about firemen appeals to ALL. This will appeal SO HARD to YOUR patrons that you'll be but wise to repeat it.

App. length, 1,000 ft. No. 158. Code word, Chief

One of those "Thanhouser Patriotics"

RELEASED, FRIDAY, NOV. 11

The American and the Queen

is a ROYAL creation from an AMERICAN studio. But that should'nt reflect on our PATRIOTISM! The fact is that the picture AROUSES patriotism. Primarily its purpose is to make you yell for "Old Glory" AND THEN to entertain you. The entertainment feature is totally secondary to the patriotic part. This release will demonstrate that Fourth o' July is'nt the only day for a PATRIOTIC DEMONSTRATION.

POWERS PICTURE PLAYS

Have you ever seen any dramatic pictures that hold the attention of your audience as Powers Dramas do?

Do any other comedies get as many laughs as the Powers Comedies do?

Released, Saturday, Nov. 5th

"A Russian Romance"

A thrilling drama in which a Russian noble-woman pursues the man suspected of having killed her husband, meets the man, falls in love with him, and when she discovers his identity, causes his arrest. The lover proves to her that he is innocent of murder; the woman secures his release by a clever ruse, and the lovers are re-united. Special scenery and costumes. Great acting.

Released, Tuesday, November 8th

"Moonshine and Love"

A drama of the Tennessee mountains. A young school-teacher accidentally enters a cave in which an illicit whiskey-still is in operation. He is held captive until a pathetic letter written to the school-teacher by the sick daughter of the chief "moonshiner" falls into the father's hands. The teacher is released and sent back to the girl he loves, and the still is destroyed by a "cave-in." Great scenic effects.

"When Love Is Young"

A Farce Comedy

May breaks her engagement with Dick because he kisses her beautiful widowed mother. Then May, to spite Dick, becomes engaged to his handsome father. Dick then engages himself to May's mother. Imagine the funny complications that follow. The end is the funniest of all.

New York City, October 20th.
Gentlemen.—I was glad to notice in your release of the 15th, "A Woman's Wit," a very decided improvement in subject over the great majority of pictures of the "wild and woolly." Permit me also to congratulate you on the fine work, photographing and acting shown in this picture.

Notice!

There will be eight Imps in November

—one every Monday and one every Thursday! See that you get every blessed one of them. Why shouldn't you get them? Can you think of any valid reason why your exchange should not give you every Imp that is released? In your heart don't you know they are far and away the best money-makers you can use? Then why on earth shouldn't you get TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK? Think it over and quit being an easy mark. Get TWO IMPS or GET BUSY! We have already told you about "Willie," our release of November 3. Now we tell you about two more November pippins:

"KEEPING HIS WORD"

A great playwright once said, "Make 'em laugh or make 'em cry and you'll be successful in the play business." This picture will bring tears to the eyes of the hardest hearted old skinflint in your audience. And it will bring the women folks back again and again for another fine, moist weep. Take our word for it, and begin yelling for this film right away. It will be released Monday, November 7.

"THE MODEL'S REDEMPTION"

This is a corker. It comes out Thursday, November 10. It tells a rattling good story of a poor artist and his model. You'll see some acting, some photography and some staging that will make you prouder than ever of your Imps. If your exchange man can't give you this film, kiss him good-bye and go to an exchange man who will.

NOTICE.

The new Western offices of the Moving Picture World, Rooms 307-309, Post building, 160 Washington street, Chicago, are now ready to receive World readers visiting Chicago. Mr. John M. Bradlet, Western representative of the World, will extend to every one a cordial welcome. They will find a complete file of manufacturers' catalogues and a bureau of information on films, theater construction, materials and supplies. They will also find desks and stationery for their correspondence, the services of a lady stenographer and a polite messenger boy to act as their guide or go their errands. We invite every exhibitor or person interested in motion pictures to make our Western office their headquarters when visiting Chicago.

To the Reader.

The absence of several former advertisers from the pages of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD is the subject of comment. In explanation we beg to state that in several cases we have been compelled to refuse further credit, hence the use of the pruning knife. In other instances the advertiser has withdrawn because he "considered the policy of the paper inimical to his interests." This he had a perfect right to do. We also have equal right to maintain our policy. We wish to make it clear that no intimidation will cause us to deviate therefrom.

This paper is the servant of the public—not the mouth-piece of private or corporate interests. We owe to our subscribers a duty that means more to us than immediate personal gain. If we refuse to say that black is white it is because we honestly believe and know that black is not white. If, for a consideration, we should allow ourselves to be tempted to persuade our readers to the contrary, we should not deserve their support and would not be serving the best interests of the business as a whole, which is the mission of this paper, and the only motive that dictates its policy

The Diluted Picture.

Several times of late we have paid visits to theaters which are nominally devoted to the moving picture (we might say primarily so), and yet, nevertheless, feature vaudeville. We have endeavored, as far as possible, to put ourselves in the position of members of the entertainment seeking public—removing ourselves, for the time being, from association with the picture in the newspaper technical sense. We were, in fact, students and observers. To an extent many members of the trade: manufacturers, renters, exhibitors and others: do this. It is quite common for us to hear that people directly interested in the picture, visit theaters in order to study the effect of their and their competitors' pictures upon audiences. By this means they arrive at some idea of what the public wants.

Of course, we have a predilection for the picture. We would like to always see it occupy a primary instead of a secondary position in the theater. Our recent observations persuade us that the general public are in a similar frame of mind. On the occasions of the visits that we made, we felt that not enough picture was shown, and that those pictures which were shown were not so good as they might, could, should or ought to have been. The effect on our minds, and we believe on the minds of the audience of which we formed part, was a feeling of dissatisfaction, that, as a competitor with the really admirable vaudeville acts that we saw, the picture was not seen to its best possible advantage. In other words, the picture, to use our own phrase, was "diluted" down by a superabundance of vaudeville liquid.

Whose fault is this? It is certainly not that of the conductors of these vaudeville houses? They are plain men of business, and it stands to reason that they would not have so much money to disburse for pictures as they are required to pay out for vaudeville acts. If a vaudeville theater manager could get pictures comparable in satisfying qualities to high-class vaudeville acts, he would choose the former, because we imagine they are much cheaper.

This drives us to the conclusion that the fault for this state of affairs is traceable to the manufacturers or some of them. This again brings us round to our old contention that, generally speaking, there is much room for improvement in quality. Let us state a specific case in illustration of our meaning: Two successive nights we visited one of the best known vaudeville theaters in New York City where the picture is being shown. The pictures exhibited on the occasion of our visit were of a trifling and inconsequential kind. The photography of them was indifferent; the acting equally so; while the stories were so slight and vague that they did not hold the attention of the audience. The result was, in our observation, that two large audiences, numbering very many hundreds, went away with by no means a too exalted opinion of the moving picture. Can it be wondered at, therefore, that in specific cases, vaudeville should be placed in the primary position and the picture in the secondary?

We cannot too earnestly impress upon our manufacturing readers, that if they are to hold the position which they and the picture have created for themselves in the entertainment field, they must adopt some means for assuring that none but the best kind of work reaches the public. A revolution, if not a reformation of methods, seems called for. Possibly the manufacturers are overproducing! Possibly in the mad haste for success they are putting out too many pictures! The latter is probably one of the causes why the picture seems to reach the public in a state of dilution. Over a year ago we printed an article under the heading, "Killing the Goose that Lays the Golden Egg." Our opinion, then, was that too many pictures of indifferent quality were being sent out, and that the daily change in the larger cities was a needless waste of energy. It seems to us, therefore, that fewer pictures of a better quality would meet the situation. This would mean fewer releases on the part of the manufacturers. Unfortunately, however, at the present time the tendency seems to be to increase the number of releases, a policy that we think a dangerous one, as there is the risk of surfeiting the public with mediocre productions. We are not asking the manufacturers to confine their efforts to the highest kind of classic subjects. This pleases only the few. We think, however, that a happy medium may be struck, whereby a better, but not excessive, supply of subjects striking a high average of public taste would meet the necessity of the case, and prevent the picture having the unwelcome aspect or being diluted by, comparatively speaking, superior vaudeville.

To Whom Does the Credit Belong?

A few months ago a certain New York yellow journal was actively engaged in a campaign against the moving pictures generally. Expecting great success to crown their efforts they prepared to make capital for themselves as great moral champions, although vindictiveness rather than morality inspired their efforts. After signal and ignominious failure, besides the exposure of their true purpose, they abandoned the field of censorship.

Recently another New York paper, perhaps not quite so yellow as its contemporary, has appeared before the public as the guardian of its morals. In agitating for a new board of censorship it speaks of its efforts as if they were alone in fighting a vicious evil "pro bono publico." What object this latter paper has in view has not yet fully appeared although there is enough to cast a strong suspicion upon the sincerity of their "campaign." In a recent article they claim that certain film manufacturers are commending them for their purpose and assuring them that manufacturers are pleased with the efforts they are putting forth, besides wishing them all possible success. It is to be regretted (if these articles are true) that manufacturers allow themselves to be "interviewed" for the purpose of strengthening sensational campaigns when the true object is obscured, and newspaper capital made out of a somewhat hypocritical method of posing as the moral guardians of the public. There is rapidly coming a higher grade of moving picture exhibitions, and one or another of these papers wishes to claim the credit by endeavoring to appropriate to themselves the honor of bringing in that improvement with which, indeed, they have had nothing to do.

This flagrant duplicity is increased by the fact that these same papers are responsible for other and greater evils in other ways than they can possibly see in moving pictures.

With regard to the actual criticism or censorship of moving pictures where needed, no paper has done, or can do, better work than the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. It has ever been a part of the policy of the WORLD to secure the best work and the highest moral tone in every respect, and in the columns of this paper to criticize and condemn in unmistakable language anything that was unworthy, even as it has been ready to praise that which was deserving. In following this course we have had no ulterior or questionable motive, because as the organ of the moving picture fraternity only their highest good, as well as the best appreciation of a discriminating public is the object in view.

If, therefore, there is any just credit due for working with a notable object in view it certainly does not belong to either of the daily papers mentioned, and while we are not going to claim for ourselves any honor or praise, we do claim to yield to no one our position as sponsors for everything that is best for all interested in the moving pictures, whether for pleasure or profit.

We can only further add that we might wish that the columns of this paper may be more freely used for the expression of the views of our friends—or our enemies, for the matter of that—rather than the columns of a daily paper which has not the best interests of the work at heart.

The Alliance's Call to Arms.

A Word to the Exhibitor.

As the Moving Picture World goes to press this week a meeting of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance is being held at Cleveland. Convened by R. G. Bachman, the president, the object of the meeting referred to elsewhere is to voice the dissatisfaction of some of the Independent exchanges with the situation as it affects them.

Overwhelming evidence reaches us that the exhibitor is in similar case, viz., dissatisfied with the conditions of the business. Let us examine the reasons for this.

There are four factors necessary to the progress and conservation of the moving picture business of this country, and, for that matter, of every other country: (1) The manufacturer. (2) The renter, distributor or exchange. (3) The exhibitor. (4) The public. These factors are interdependent. By an unassailable law of commercial economics, they must also separately exist, we might say be autonomous. The manufacturer must produce goods to satisfy the public. Before, however, his goods reach the public it is essential that they pass through two intermediate channels, the wholesaler and the retailer. The wholesaler is the exchange; the retailer is the exhibitor. You cannot safely eliminate any one of these factors from any branch of industry.

On this occasion we are not inclined to address either the manufacturer or the renter. Nor are we directly concerned with the public, which is a court of last appeal that decides everything for itself. The public always does. The public (or the consumer) may be more or less influenced by what is said or written to it, but in the last analysis, there is nothing whatever behind the public. The public finally decides and its decisions are irrevocable. We all stand or fall by what the public does. But what it does, and why, it is futile to inquire when it has done it.

Of the four factors that we have specified, that which is in closest touch with the public, is the exhibitor. Upon him, therefore, devolves the duty, the responsibility, of giving the public what it wants in the way of moving pictures. Now, what does the public want? It wants the best moving pictures, by whomsoever made, and wheresoever made. It wants freedom of choice. It wants variety. It wants novelty. It wants, what is the inalienable right of every freeborn American citizen, viz., the gratification of its natural desires to spend its money where it pleases and to get the best value for its money. It wants, in plain language, an open store, an open market. It wants liberty. In other words, it wants a free moving picture theater, or one where it has the assurance that it is getting what can be got, namely, a choice of the best film, whensoever, wheresoever, and by whomsoever, made.

In the interview which we had with Mrs. Clement, of Boston, recently, she, like thousands of other exhibitors, in this country, voiced a common grievance, namely that by present exigencies she could not buy her films where she chose and give her public what she knows her public wants, a program of the best pictures. Mrs. Clement, like other exhibitors, has her hands tied. She is not free to conduct her business in the manner in which she thinks it ought to be conducted. So her public suffers. So the moving picture public all over the United States suffers. The hands of every exhibitor are tied. He is in a comparatively defenseless position. He cannot give the public what the public wants, because he has to take just what is offered to him.

The manufacturers work through a coterie of exchanges who also have no choice. This system may be, and is, of untold benefit to the mediocre manufacturer. While it does not place a ban upon quality it reacts upon certain manufacturers to this extent, that, with an open market their sales would double and treble over what they are now selling. On the other hand an open market would mean starvation sales to some, and, without a business organization, their product would go begging at 6 cents a foot. It is to ward off this demoralizing state of affairs that we have these trade organizations. It is why the progressive and intelligent manufacturer allows himself, with noble self-sacrifice, to be burdened by the millstone of the tyro. It is a choice between two evils.

We will be pleased to voice the ideas of exhibitors and others on these important points.

Who will solve the problem?

The Usual Thing.

Fourth Article.

The third of the series of articles under the above caption, which we printed two weeks ago, struck home. The cap fitted several wearers for whom it was not specifically meant. Their heads happened to be in the way, however, when the cap fell. Hinc illae lachrymæ. In other words, there were remonstrances from the mouths of these ex- and present press agents, who, it is our duty to point out again, are not doing their employers the least bit of good by their absurd over-laudation of very mediocre pictures.

It is a charity for us to veil our meaning in general terms, but, if we are challenged, we shall be more specific, and shall name the offending press agents. We shall also print their records written by themselves. We shall analyze what they are saying about their employers' pictures, and we shall have to say something on the matter to the exhibitor, who is the man most entitled to complain of the misrepresentations of the press agent.

We said before that the press agent was a potent factor in perpetuating the "usual thing," in boosting up the bad, the mediocre and the indifferent moving picture. Excluded from these, and all other respectable columns, the press agent has broken out in another direction, deceiving and cajoling the exhibitor through the maleficent agency of a house organ. What is a house organ? A house organ is simply a trade circular, issued by a trade house, in which a manufacturer, through the pen of an employee, says just exactly what he thinks he will about his own goods. So it has come to pass, that the press agent, finding that the pages of the Moving Picture World are not open to his slimy laudations, has let himself loose in his house organ, of which there are several kinds scattered broadcast amongst exhibitors.

They all come under one head, that is: chartered libertinism in the way of printers' ink. We have a collection of these books in front of us as we write this article. For the life of us, we are at a loss to understand why the respective heads of the respective companies in whose names these house organs are issued should allow them to be disseminated. They are just about the most damaging kind of advertising that can be indulged in. To believe what they say, you would imagine that every picture issue from every house in this country is a masterpiece. Unfortunately we know the opposite to be the case. We wonder what the exhibitor thinks of it all. We are no opponents of the house organ per se; on the contrary, we think that if it were well conducted and issued in a dignified way, it would help the business. But when these things simply consist of a series of intemperate boosts by the ignorant, if adroit, users of printers' ink, then, in the interests of the business as a whole, we think a protest is called for. We advise the exhibitor, then, to treat these publications somewhat cautiously.

Only this week we had a concrete illustration of the mischief wrought by the press agents' over-glorification of the usual thing. A friend at a distance, being swayed somewhat by these rhodomontades, asked us to see a much lauded picture, and to inform him, whether in our opinion, it reached the standard of quality assigned to it. We preferred not to act in this matter ourselves, so we sought a number of opinions in the trade. Those opinions were distinctly adverse to the press agent's opinion of his employer's picture. The result was that we could not advise our friend to order it. This is only one of many instances we could cite of the danger of over-lauding the usual thing. The boomerang recoils in a retributory manner.

As we have said before, exaggeration is an ingrained American habit; but the sooner the film people get out of this habit, the better it will be for their business. Fooling the public, which seems to be the principal object of some of these press agents, is bad business. The public has a habit of thinking and acting for itself, as Mr. Murdock, Mr. Freeman and others at one time in the "game," discovered to their cost. These gentlemen tried to force the "usual thing" down the throats of the public. Result: Mr. Freeman and Mr. Murdock are out of the "game." But the public still goes on in its calm, silent way, accepting the good and rejecting the bad. And so it always will.

The Children.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

The moving picture play has been called the children's theater! Children are called the most important part of the human family because in them is stored up the future. Educators say children must receive special attention, clergymen say they must receive first attention. Parents say they must receive all attention, etc., etc., etc.

In spite of all this the children are being deprived of many of the advantages of the moving picture which they ought to enjoy in their earliest years. On one side, moving picture people are shutting the children out by not catering for them; and on the other side, the law is shutting them out by preventing their admittance unless of a certain mature age or accompanied by guardians. These harsh conditions should be made unnecessary by a proper provision for the adaptation of moving picture exhibitions, both in obedience to the law and the requirements of the young.

Several months ago there appeared in the Moving Picture World a series of opinions given by children upon the pictures they had seen. These opinions were both timely and intelligent. In addition to the children's expression of those things they like to see, and the opinions of all the proper authorities of what they ought to see, it does seems as though it should be comparatively easy for the picture people to prepare especially, and give the children proper and acceptable exhibitions. In making this plea for the children, there can be no doubt that we are presenting a claim upon the attention of those who have the best interests of moving pictures at heart, it being a well-known fact that that which secures the children's support has also secured the support of all the people.

The writer has often wondered why children were not encouraged even under the present incomplete conditions to a larger patronage by securing their attendance with their parents and guardians. The present system of making it a tax upon the parents to accompany their children is prohibitive in thousands of families. Would it not be profitable to exhibitors if they charged parents with children one price, and that the minimum rate; as, for instance, in a family there are three children; they wish to go to a moving picture theater and have their "half price"; they are, however, unable to do so unless accompanied by their parents who may not just wish to go, or if poor cannot spare the money. If the father goes he wishes to take the mother, and if the admission is ten cents he must needs spend twenty cents to enable the children to spend fifteen cents—more than an increase of one hudred per cent. to please the children. What is the result in the majority of instances? They simply don't go—the children lose the pleasure, and the exhibitor loses the money. Whereas if because they had their children with them the parents were charged the uniform minimum rate, the whole family would benefit. This consideration would not affect adults generally, as all right thinking people are glad of any advance which means good for the children. May we look for special consideration for the children in all branches of moving picture work.

SHOWS NOT BREEDERS OF VICE.

Rev. Mr. Houghton Says Good Word for Moving Pictures.

Moving picture shows of Sioux City are not conducive to immorality, was the statement of Rev. H. L. Houghton, probation officer of Sioux City and social secretary of the Y. M. C. A., after noting the report sent out from Des Moines by the probation officer that a large percentage of girls are driven to ruin by the darkened rooms of the motion picture houses. The Des Moines article indicated that the absence of light in the theaters afforded unlimited privileges for the young men and women who visited them and that thy had become a breeding place for vice.

"As the representative locally of the National Board of Censorship of Moving Pictures, also as probation officer," Rev. Mr. Houghton said, "I have been accustomed to visit the theaters of the city where moving pictures are shown and have not found the conditions as described by Mrs. McFarland, the Des Moines probation officer. The rooms of the theaters I have found to be well lighted and no unseemly conditions prevailing. Furthermore, I think the class of pictures shown in Sioux City are all right morally, and in many cases educational and inspiring. The only criticism I would make would be with the parents of the children who allow the youngsters to come down town late in the evenings and go to these shows."—Sioux City "Journal."

NUPTIALS.

A Biograph idyll which has been very quietly rehearsed in the neighborhood of Union square for some time, terminated to the strains of the wedding march on Wednesday, October 26. On the evening of that day Miss Mayme Elinore, who is well known to many World readers, was quietly married to Leo E. Dougherty, the popular publicity manager of the Biograph Company. Only the immediate relatives of the couple were present and Mr. Dougherty was at his desk next day as if nothing had happened. The World's benediction is bestowed upon the happy pair.

The Sentiment of the Picture. III.

An Eclair Success.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

The phrases, the "sentiment of the picture," and "the usual thing" have passed into moving picture currency from these pages. I feel some little pride in having been instrumental in putting them into circulation. Everybody now knows what is meant by "the usual thing" in the way of picture making, and, knowing, have been educated up to looking for and appreciating the unusual thing; that is, the picture of exceptional merit. Therefore, it may reasonably be supposed that this little phrase will in due time be instrumental in uplifting the quality of the picture. It will put producers and others on the alert to make better pictures week by week, so that they shall not fall under the designation of the usual thing.

Equal success has attended the phrase, "the sentiment of the picture." People are looking for an interpretation of an author's meaning on the screen—something which conveys his intentions. At present the scenario editor, or producer, overrides or overshadows an author in the majority of cases. In moving picture scenario writing, there is probably yet no author with sufficient authority to insist that the sentiment of his story shall be respected by the producer. But that time is bound to come.

In a former article, I explained what I meant by the sentiment of the picture. It is not necessary to repeat myself. As I prefer wherever possible to give a concrete example of my meaning, let me refer to a series of pictures which was shown me this week by the Eclair Manufacturing Company, of 31 East Twenty-seventh street, New York City. These seem to me to get the "sentiment of the pictures" over. In them I detected verisimilitude, feeling and reverential treatment; indeed, as I looked at the subjects, I felt as though I were looking on the real thing itself. For example: there is a beautiful "Resurrection of Lazarus," to be released on November the 7th. This tells the biblical story in a series of superbly acted scenes, enacted in Palestine. Local actors, accurately costumed, were selected, the scenery was as far as possible that of the Palestine of old, and it seemed to me that the biblical legend could not have been more perfectly presented on the screen that it was by the Eclair Company. Perfect pictorial photography allied to natural acting, and, so far as I can judge, accurate costuming against real Palestine scenery, seemed to me to make the picture perfect in its sentiment. One felt that one was witnessing a flawless rendering of the story of Lazarus.

Then the Eclair Company took me also to Tibet, the mysterious land of the Grand Lama. The company's operator pointed his camera, it seems, on the most sacred Tibetan temples. One had views of the ancient buildings, processions of priests, musicians, Chinese officers and crowds of followers all engaged in showing homage to the Dalai Lama. Here was the gorgeous East with all its barbaric richness and mystery sympathetically rendered on the screen. Then, again, the Eclair Company took me to North Africa, where they filmed the story of a woman's love and faithfulness to death. This story, again, was set and worked out amidst gorgeous Eastern settings and scenery. Some of the pictures were inexpressibly splendid from the photographic point of view. The story was splendid, dealing, of course, with the stronger passions of Eastern human nature. But it was thoroughly human, thoroughly moving in its tragic simplicity.

Still, I paid little heed to the story. To me it was fascinating to watch these scenes of Oriental life and character, presented against a gorgeous Eastern background, by means of perfect photography grouping, composition, life and treatment. Here, again, it seemed to me that the company had got down to the sentiment of the work and had succeeded in impressing us from the moving picture on the screen.

I desire in this article to congratulate the Eclair Company upon their beautiful work. I have spoken favorably of this company's work before, and especially so because of the fact that it is alleged by the ignoramus, or should I say, the jealous competitor, to be unsuitable for this—the American—market. Rubbish! The Eclair pictures, with possibly a few examples, of a distinctly Gallic kind, have all the potentiality of popularity amongst American moving picture theatergoers as any other productions presented to them. That they are not so widely distributed as they deserve to be is due to trade causes and jealousies which I hope to see overcome.

Certainly there are no better films than those of the Eclair Company. I wish them, therefore, all the success they deserve for their qualifications. There is no doubt about the genuineness of these pictures. The Lazarus story was actually photographed in Palestine. Asiatic characters acted the film. The Tibetan pictures were photographed in Tibet. The African pictures were photographed in Africa. These things were done in the places named, not amongst the peaceful glades of New Jersey or the bosky recesses of Brooklyn.

The Eclair Company went to nature and in going to nature they went a great way towards translating the sentiment or the feeling of their pictures into their films. That is the formula I would recommend to other film makers. Go to nature for your subjects, then you will get the sentiment of your subjects in your pictures. Let us have fidelity, accuracy, truth, verisimilitude in our pictures, then we will get sentiment. The made-up, the faked, the false and the meretricious will never get the sentiment of the picture over to an audience.

THE SWING OF THE PENDULUM.

Montana Court Decides in Favor of Sunday Shows.

A decision which is of local interest has just been handed down by the Montana Supreme Court upon an appeal from Missoula, relating to the operation of moving picture shows on Sunday. A Lewiston jury rendered a verdict about two years ago strictly in accord with the view taken by the Supreme Court, but at Missoula a theater manager had been found guilty of violating a State law. An appeal was taken to the higher court with the result that the charge against the manager is now ordered to be dismissed.

The court, by its decision, holds that a moving picture show is not a theatrical performance. "The statement of facts discloses that the pictures shown at the time and place mentioned in the complaint," says the opinion, "were all of a clean and moral character and had been approved by a Board of Censorship, which had the power to prohibit and did prohibit the exhibition of any unclean or immoral scene or picture; the moving pictures were accompanied by piano music, and, as a part of the performance, a vocal solo of a sentimental nature, accompanied by music on the piano, was sung. We cannot perceive how this sort of an entertainment could possibly affect either the morals or the good order of the city of Missoula or its inhabitants. It appears to us to have been an innocent amusement having a tendency to instruct, rather than to demoralize or disturb; and as the Legislature has not seen fit to prohibit it, the courts ought not to do so."

The Pictural Drama As A Fine Art

by LOUIS REEVES HARRISON

SECOND ARTICLE.

There are some beautiful and interesting things coming in motion pictures. The business is far from being at a standstill and the movement is not downward. The best has not been done, the ultimate has not been reached, and those who are turning the spot light of intelligent criticism upon mediocrity are the truest friends of progress. Those who must be nursed along with indiscriminate praise, who are not broad enough and brave enough to see the necessity for sincere discussion of merit, character and quality, are already marked for elimination. Their place is with the low brow, who sits guarding his small hoard at the entrance of his cave. All suggestive criticism is not valuable, but the up-to-date business man observes, selects and appropriates what is useful and profits from keeping apace with the times.

I have had advance news of some of these good things to come, and there is a tendency visible to put the business on a permanent footing by treating it as a fine art. In two instances I was particularly interested because I was familiar with the scenarios, and these I will cite to illustrate the necessity of intelligent direction. In case number one, the director possibly felt that he could not earn his salary without adding something of his own to the author's conception of what the piece should be. The result was so inharmonious that I foresee a flat failure for that production. In case number two, there was no deviation from the scenario except a trivial one, the advantageous substitution of a front yard for a colonial porch.

What is the message?

In the second case, the director used a lot of grey matter to enforce what the author had written. He gave no time to mutilating the scenario, but devoted his full attention to an admirable choice of actors, to drilling them thoroughly in their parts, and he afforded them a clear view of the idea to be conveyed. He also exercised care and taste in the selection of exteriors and in setting appropriate interiors, omitting no detail contributory to local color. With the playwright and producer in harmony, the spirit of the play was not only preserved, but so strongly set forth that the result will be well worth studying, if it does not prove to be a masterpiece of motion picture construction.

In case number one, the director may have felt equal to staging a spoken play, and have regarded the pictural drama as of minor importance. If so, he did not realize that he was dealing with a distinctive instrument of thought, one appealing to the first of the five senses alone, and one requiring the practical application of esthetic principles. His settings were so indifferent as to be discordant, and then his intrusions were wholly out of keeping with the purposes of the story. His presentation was stagey and therefore artificial. Now the advantage photoplays have over those on the stage is that they can do away with artificiality. They appeal to the brain entirely through the eye, and most effectively by means of moving images, events and scenes closely approximating those of actual existence. This naturalness is one of the greatest charms of the pictural drama, and venerable traditions of the older art should not be allowed to mar this delight. The stage has been notoriously artificial since the days when a man stood L. U. E. with a sign hung round his neck announcing that he was the moon.

The message is obvious.

One director has grasped the fact that the recently discovered combination of the pictural and dramatic arts constitutes a freshly made form of communication from one mind to others, an advanced medium of thought transference, calling forth new forms of skill and drawing allied arts into its embrace. In its supreme development it is a fine art.

The other director told me that audiences of picture shows would not appreciate a good thing if they saw it. It is true that the crowd has a mind of its own, apart from that of its most intelligent members. It is more emotional than intellectual, is more credulous than reasonable, and its general tendency as a crowd is lower than the average intelligence of its members, this is true at a regular theater. I admit that the audience at stage representations is often unable to closely study and follow the lines from a detached and discriminating point of view of its best members, but I find a peculiar difference in the audience at motion-picture shows. They are of all classes, those of limited means predominating, but there seems to be a pervading love of what is attractive in nature. Further than that, natural things afford them delight. They understand and are entertained by what is representatively and delightfully natural, an exquisite landscape, a woman of engaging personality, a loveable little child, a well told story, and the lower elements seem most powerfully affected by true representations of what is implanted in us at birth. The language of a play may be too involved for swift comprehension, but what is seen to be in keeping with actual experience and common human emotions becomes powerfully effective. The people in the audience are sincere and spontaneous; it is those on the stage who are false and artificial. I am not one of those lost in admiration of purely mechanical representations on the stage of to-day, and I think that neither art is measured by its pretensions, but by its aspirations.

Then, too, when the lights are turned down, and we can no longer look around us while enjoying the familiar jokes of the comedian, the rattle of the clog dance or the melody the chalky soubrette sings through her teeth, the sense of hearing becomes entirely subordinated to the much higher one of sight. The variety entertainment requires no mental effort, but, when the picture play is shadowed forth upon the screen, there is a hush all over the theater, restless movements cease, there is a general effort at concentration which raises the appreciative capacity of all minds. There can no longer be perception without attention, the loss of one scene means a chapter torn from the story, and this absorbed attention through a sense closely associated with the highest mental faculties contributes to a higher appreciation of what is presented. With the audience in such a condition, the play that does not go over lacks the elusive quality, whereas the one that does is a valuable contribution to a new and beautiful art.

THE EXHIBITORS OPPORTUNITY.

It is time that all interested in motion pictures should stop pulling the blanket on every side and try instead to place the industry on some solid basis.

There is not an industry in the whole world, except cinematography, that is so monopolized by the manufacturers. In general, the manufacturers are the servants of the distributors, while the distributors are the humble servants of the consumers. Even the great Tobacco Trust, with its thousands of stores all over the country, does not dictate to the public what brand they should smoke and what brand they must refuse.

It is true that certain film manufacturers have and are still spending much money on studios and factories, but the capital of the combined manufacturers does not amount to half the capital invested by the renters, and the total capital of the exchanges does not represent half the capital invested by the exhibitors.

We claim some 10,000 moving picture theaters in the United States. Some of these houses run in six figures, most of them run in five figures, while few are below four figures. In saying that the theaters average an investment of $2,500, we find that the exhibitors have at least $25,000,000 tied up in the business perhaps against $5,000,000 of actual value on manufacturing plants.

Is it then natural that the men who have the least money invested in the business, should be the ones to dictate to those who are more heavily interested? Not only to tell them what films they should show, but to force them to conduct their houses under arbitrary rules.

The manufacturers can do nothing without the exhibitors; they have to depend on the exhibitors to get their own living, so the manufacturers should have consideration for the exhibitor.

In all lines of business, the manufacturers cannot impose their goods on the distributors; they have to produce goods that the distributors can use and the distributor must get goods to suit his market.

We need honest, strong exchanges, able to buy in large quantities so as to encourage the manufacturers and at the same time insure a good service to the exhibitor. With limited capital, the exchanges could not buy regularly and consequently were forced to slip some old junk into the programs. Some Independent manufacturers have made good, yet if they had been better supported by the exchanges—I mean, if the exchanges had purchased enough copies to keep the manufacturers going—they would have been in a position to improve their work.

The licensed manufacturers had many strong exchanges to buy enough copies to make the manufacturers rich, but then the manufacturers did not like the idea of having their films sold on their merits, and to be at liberty to eliminate the question of merit and force the exchanges to buy every licensed film, bad or good, they decided to secure control of the exchanges.

The situation has evolved a third party. Enough men of experience and of capital are forced out of the licensed side because they refuse to take notes for their exchanges. These men of money and of experience are taking the lead, joining hands with the present Independent exchanges, reinforcing the Alliance and making the Alliance what it should have been from the first: a strong body of distributors to dictate to the manufacturers.

The exchanges, as distributors, must be free to buy from whom they please and in quantities to suit themselves. This is the only salvation. This will force an open market, and when the pictures will be sold on their merits, the manufacturers will have to keep improving if they want to retain their sales. The manufacturers unable to produce good pictures will gradually and naturally drop off. The manufacturers can league themselves to regulate the wages and prices, but the control of the motion pictures must remain in the hands of the distributors or of the Alliance as their official organization.

J. W. JENNINGS.

DRAWING A PARALLEL.

C. O. Baumann (president of the New York Motion Picture Company) and H. J. Streyckmans, the press agent of the company, having taken exception to our criticisms of Bison pictures, we, in justice to the company, append Mr. Streyckmans' opinion of Bison pictures as expressed in the company's trade circular, "Film Fancies," together with a criticism of the latest Bison release by that staid theatrical journal, "The Dramatic Mirror."

"FILM FANCIES" (STREYCKMANS).

Bison Establishes Quality.

Conceived at a time when the "Bison" was the first and pioneer film of quality to be placed upon the market, the first release being made on May 21, 1909, and the types of the players were then fashioned, as the demand for this product has steadily increased. The organization of this company practically established a new era in cinematography, the competitors being forced into renewed efforts to keep pace with the young leader which had sprung to the front.

The founders of the Bison company did not plunge into the project without deep deliberation, but after mature thought and a careful analysis of the situation they decided that the exhibitors as a whole were an intelligent body of men who would appreciate film of real quality and would extend their patronage and support to those who supplied them. "Quality" was the slogan, and "Excelsior" was the motto.

THE DRAMATIC MIRROR.

The Wrong Trail (Bison, Oct. 21).

In the name of [illegible] Bison Company [illegible] sent [illegible] to our [illegible] to [illegible] sent [illegible] to our [illegible] brought [illegible] The [illegible] night. Now [illegible] a turn [illegible] The story isn't bad, it is merely [illegible] And the details of the film are even more feeble. The appearance of the good sister to overcome the will, the alteration of the signs on the guide post, the desert—it is so palpably artificial that any one with common sense can only smile at the crudeness of its theatricality.

Dunkirk, N. Y.—James L. Drohen's fine new house in this city is nearing completion and will be opened on November 9, and is to be named the Drohen Theater. It has a 60 by 30 foot stage and with the two galleries will seat 2,000, being the largest amusement house in this section outside of Buffalo. It is of fireproof construction throughout, the front entrance being marble lined and tiled and the imitation marble and onyx trim giving the house an exceedingly handsome and substantial appearance. Alternating with the offerings of the best companies that come to this section, Mr. Drohen will run licensed pictures, and as he is Dunkirk's pioneer moving picture man, being interested in no less than four other picture houses, his experience will enable him to provide the patrons of his up-to-date new house with the latest and best that the present day amusement field has to offer.

Butler, N. J.—This is a small manufacturing town in the Ramapo Mountains and, with the neighboring town of Bloomingdale, contains some 4,000 to 5,000 inhabitants, 75 per cent. of whom are employed in the two mills located in Butler. The nearest city for these people to visit and spend their time and money is Paterson, which boasts of more theaters (melodrama and burlesque) and picture houses than any other city of its size hereabouts. But there are those who do not desire such a trip for mere pleasure and they get their amusement right in their home town, at two moving picture houses, Goldie's Theater and the Bijou. Goldie's Theater, situated on the main street almost opposite the railroad station, is a large, airy house, well ventilated and lighted, one being able to see over the entire audience during a performance. It has a seating capacity of 450, runs Independent pictures, and fairly good vaudeville for a country theater; also one illustrated song with each show, rendered alternately by a young lady of the town and the operator, which, by the way, is a new idea of introducing two voices and yet saving one salary, for when the operator steps into the spotlight, one of the ushers takes charge of the booth and projects the lantern slides. A Power's No. 5 machine, in the hands of a competent operator, occupies the coop. Goldie's Theater has a family patronage, and everybody knowing one another tends to make things sociable; during intermission, the proprietors, Messrs. Goldie, are seen in the aisles exchanging greetings with their friends. Ten and fifteen cents admission is charged, and also well spent by those who have watched a show. I myself was surprised to find such a good show and so modern and up-to-date a theater in so small a town. One very noticeable feature was the absence of the many vivid colored and lurid posters so often seen in front of a picture house here in the city.

MacARTHUR.

Moving Picture Enterprises Develop Rapidly Along Educational, News, Advertising, Private and Theatrical Ways. Headed for Los Angeles.

(From the Los Angeles "Times.")

Among the tourists who are "beating it" for California, flying from cold weather, are four or five moving picture companies with the actors, scenery and costumes. It will be a big Winter in that regard.

The Selig people and the Bison Company already are permanently located here, at Edendale. The American Biograph Company, which sent a company out last year from New York, will send another one this Winter and may possibly establish a permanent studio here.

The Vitagraph Company is sending a company to San Diego. The Lubin Company of Philadelphia will take pictures this Winter in a studio near Hollywood.

It is predicted by theatrical men that Los Angeles will be the moving picture center of America, next year.

The theatrical problem of to-day, and the one that is worrying all theatrical men, is the future of the moving picture. It is evident that this problem will be worked out to a large degree in the hills around Los Angeles.

The experience of the men engaged in manufacturing films in and about Los Angeles is that the moving picture business has split into five different commercial streams; that it will develop henceforth in different directions. These are:

The educational film.
The news film.
The advertising film.
The private film.
The theater or show film.

The first three mentioned are just beginning to develop.

In the opinion of both educators and picture men, a biograph will be a part of the equipment of every schoolhouse in the very near future and geography lessons will be learned from a motion picture screen.

In the East bugology classes in the universities are already watching the little bacilli romping about at their murderous play by means of moving pictures.

The pictures are used in an educational way by both the Army and Navy. The press dispatches only last week told of using films of running horsemen and moving skirmishers are targets for militia riflemen. The pictures are thrown at one end of the rifle gallery and the marksmen shoot as the images gallop across the screen. A red light shows the place where the bullet hits.

Very little of this work has been done locally.

Tournament, and May.

The Pasadena Tournament of Roses has been pictured. Tuna fishing about Catalina Island has been the subject of several fine films. The work of exploring the ruins of the Times Building for the victims of the dynamiting has just been "snapped." Lately they took the tennis match between May Sutton and Hazel Hotchkiss and the pictures taken last Winter of the aeroplane flying at Dominguez went all over the world. The picture companies took several prize fight films in this city and two or three big parades, like that of the Elks' festival.

The advertising end of the motion picture business has just taken a big jump among the companies of this city.

This Summer the Southern Pacific and other railroads gave one of the local companies a big commission to take pictures of the scenery around Tahoe and various other places.

Another commission has been given by an automobile company for a series of pictures to show every phase of a motor car from the rubber tires to the searchlights.

In the course of the recent visit of Barnum & Bailey to this city, a big contract was made whereby a squad of picture men traveled with the circus several days. They began with the arrival of the circus train in town and showed the driving of the tent pegs; the erection of the canvas; the street parade; the feeding and care of the animals; the performance; and finally, taking down the canvas and "breaking up" the show.

Much Used Privately.

Within the past few months, the motion picture has taken a new "flyer." The privately owned picture film has come into being.

Tally, of Tally's Broadway Theater, who is the head of the local film clearing house, is authority for the statement that several private families in Los Angeles now own their picture machines, just as they do their phonograph; and come in regularly to rent films.

The possibilities of this seem to be great. There's a way to keep the old man home now. When he begins to edge off toward the club, mother will just mention that he needn't hurry back as she and the children will entertain themselves with the new film of the pony ballet from "Ain't It Fierce on Broadway."

The expense of "every man with his own picture machine" is not very fierce. The apparatus for showing the pictures costs about $225 and can be purchased as readily as chalk or cheese. Several firms in Los Angeles have them on sale. They are not difficult to operate.

Films can be rented readily and are not excessively expensive, especially the older ones.

Many wealthy people have had moving picture films taken of their children at different stages of their development.

This is best done by contract with a picture film firm. The bare films only cost about 3 cents a foot, but the process of taking them involves the use of an expensive camera and the services of an expert.

But what a charming souvenir and reminder of one's childhood!

Its Rise Meteoric.

Of course the main use to which the moving picture has been put, so far, is as a cheap theatrical attraction.

It is one of the most absorbing phases of the modern theater. Its rise has been more than meteoric. It has been a theatrical panic. And nowhere more so than in Los Angeles. From a little back room of a pioneer photograph parlor on Spring street, where the first tetering, uncertain, shaking pictures of the skirt dance of Anna Belle and the prize fight between Jiim Corbett and Courtney was shown the moving picture has developed as a playhouse magnet. There are now some forty-five picture theaters in Los Angeles. Some of them are little less than gorgeous. One of the handsomest theaters in this city is a moving picture house.

Artistically, the pictures have developed somewhat.

Artistically, the moving picture men do not know where they are going but they're on their way.

The picture drama is still in a raw, crude state.

When they first began taking pictures, they were nearly all of dancers, military parades and the like. The first attempts of plays were those technically known as "chase films." They were without plot. The villain committed some offense and a comic hue-and-cry with women and children and dogs and men and things, strung out along the road after him. The drama mainly consisted in falling over things.

The picture play then developed to the short crude melodrama. In France, they were not crude. The little playlets put forth by the Pathe Brothers were charming and of the most subtle art. It must be confessed that those put out by the American companies were something fierce.

Americans are not naturally pantomimists. French are. French actors turned easily to the moving picture drama. Our actors had a hard time. Some of them never could learn. Some of the best actors were impossible for this work. Among the best people in the stock companies that all picture firms now maintain are those who came into the work as amateur "supes."

Hobart Bosworth, who is now producer for the Selig Picture Company in this city, is probably doing more for the development of the moving picture play than any other one man in America. Bosworth, but for his ill health, would be one of the foremost actors of this country. He brings a real brain to the making of the picture drama.

So far his work must have been unsatisfactory to himself. Most of the plays which he has been compelled to produce have been blithering rot about cowboy heroes.

The picture show has advanced not much further, thus far, than the blood and thunder melodrama which it has driven out of business.

Punk Still Goes.

The Eastern companies have been turning out, for the most part, the most excruciatingly rotten plays about the fair young country thing who fell in love with a wicked man from the city and came home to the old folks with a pale, haggard face and a little child in her arms.

The companies out here tried to equal that degree of punkness with dramas woven about Idaho Sue, the pride of the range, with some daring cowboys who got on and off the wrong side of their horses.

So far, the productions have been very much superior to the dramas. The stage management has, in some instances, been superb and the acting nearly as good. They have gone to great pains to stage insufficient and idiotic melodramas. Last Summer, for example, Mr. Bosworth took a company of wagons to the Yosemite Valley and swam the terrific rapids of the Merced River in order to give the proper color for an irritating playlet.

The picture companies have used the most wonderful and artistic pictures of the California missions as the background for stories so silly that they positively make your spine shrivel.

The picture producers have not yet had the courage or the wisdom to go to trained literary men for their plays. The local companies depend mainly on the fertile imagination of the stage managers—old stock actors. And you know the kind of a play an old stock would be likely to turn out; particularly if he had to invent one every week, as is the case.

They are beginning to see, however. One of the last catalogues of moving picture films issued to the trade advertises, among other things, "Justinian and Theodora," by Elbert Hubbard; a specially written play by Rex Beach; several by Opie Reed.

A most encouraging tendency of the picture play business is that of "picturing" well known plays and books.

A wonderful film of "Ramona" was made last Spring by one of the companies having studios in Los Angeles. The Selig Company also gave "Dora Thorne" and "Sam'l of Posen," with M. B. Curtiss himself in the star role.

In the East they have pictured many current plays, the most sensational success being the "Girl of the Golden West."

Another cheering feature is that well-known actors of established reputation are being employed—not to a great extent in this city, however.

It is hardly a secret among theater people that Joseph Kilgour was especially engaged at a whopping salary to take the part of George Washington in a recent big series of colonial pictures. He bears a remarkable resemblance to the illustrious George.

In France, a gorgeous production of the story of the Book of Esther has been put on two moving picture films. The following famous artists took the leading parts: Mlle. Gravier, of the Theater de la Renaissance, as Esther; M. Leonce Perret, of the Odeon, as Ahasuerus; M. Legrand, of the Odeon, as Mordecai.

And in so many of the best of the French pictures we see adorable little Pilar-Morin.

The fact is the moving picture show of to-day consists only of the tools to carve out an artistic future. Some day the moving picture David Belasco will appear, and for his scenic spectacles he will not rely on a half-inch rubber hose in the hands of a supe to make waterfalls; he will have Niagara. And for his "back drop," if he likes and the story suits, he can have the Grand Canyon.

IN THE LOOP OF CHICAGO.

It would be well for the magnates of the licensed side to cut short their daily mutual admiration meetings and take, once in a while, a stroll in the district of the "Loop" to see what the motion picture theaters are doing.

As stated before, the Boston, on Madison street, went Independent and I don't know if it is that the pictures are far superior or if it is a question of novelty, but the fact is that I could not enter the Boston Theater on account of a crowd of visitors waiting for their turn. This was at 8.30 on Friday evening and when I made the second attempt at 9.30 I met another crowd, while at the Alcazar, Pastime and Casino you could find plenty of seats. I went on this little tour to see for myself, as I could scarcely believe the report made at my office by persons who were very anxious to see the first Independent films shown in the "Loop." The Boston Theater cannot be sorry of their change.

Well, I do not blame the lovers of good pictures who patronize the Boston, as the other theaters are getting a poor licensed service.

At the Orpheum, if they still coin money, it is not on account of their pictures or of their light, it is that they have the only ideal location in Chicago, the place that every transient visitor is sure to visit. The light at the Orpheum is not what it should be and with their long throw at a bad angle they should improve their curtain. The machine, although a new one, is not very perfect. The other evening the operator had some twenty breaks in one reel and fairly disgusted the audience. The assistant manager told me that it was not the fault of the operator but of bad sprockets and bad patches in the film. As to the pictures, complaints have been heard during the past months. If A. Jones would spend one hour each day in his Orpheum Theater he would soon realize the kind of films the public want.

Another fault with the service is that the third reel is generally shown without a title. The Orpheum shows two first runs and one reel about one month old and it is this third reel that often appears without its title. This is easy to understand. It is the clever work of the General Film Company. When the American Film Service was the property of Mr. Van Ronkel, said Van Ronkel was working day and night to watch his exchange, to see that a first class service was given to all its patrons, etc. Since Mr. Van Ronkel was coaxed to part with his exchange and accept a modest salary as the manager, said Von Ronkel lost all interest in the exchange and he now works like most of the clerks, so many hours for so many dollars, paying no attention to the service and not overworking himself. This explains why films are sent to the theaters without titles and, in most cases, in no condition to be shown; as was the case with a certain film exhibited at the Casino. Evidently the promoters of the General Film Company do not care if the business goes to the dogs, their main object is to make quick money.

The program at the Orpheum was:

"His Life for His Queen."
"A Wedding Trip Through Canada to Hong Kong."
"Bertie's Elopment" (no title).
"Big Medicine."

"His Life for His Queen" was the best reel of the evening, yet it is not with such films that the Pathes can uphold their reputation.

I could see nothing in "A Wedding Through Canada." It was not a dramatic, not a comedy, not a scenic, not an industrial, not even an entertaining picture. If the film was a scenic some good clear sharp photography should have been required to show the beauties of the Canadian views. The way that the newlyweds are acting in the dining car, shows plainly that both the actor and the actress had no conception of the parts they were playing. It was not a honeymoon but a silly exaggerated trip. A gentleman who had missed the title said: "What a rot." Then turning to the usher he asked of him: "Is it a Pathe or a Selig?" When the usher informed him that it was an Edison, the gentleman exclaimed: "Is it possible?"

When Bertie's Elopment" appeared on the screen there was no title, not even a sub-title. In this film it would have been better for the manufacturer to omit his trade-mark, a diamond, as the production is no credit to him and certain Independents do far better work. It is an old plot rehashed too many times, with nothing new and the details not taken care of. According to the story, the elopement is to take place in the dark of the night. One scene, the one of the ladder at the window, shows that it is night, but when the elopers reach the carriage it is bright daylight. Useless to call attention to the numerous blunders in this film, suffice to say that the young man, acting the part of the stern and obdurate father, looks more and dresses more like he was the brother of the girl or the chum of her sweetheart.

This program was certainly very discouraging and there is no wonder that folks were crowding the Boston, anxious to see something new.

I do not say that Mr. Jones will go Independent, as with the ideal location of his Orpheum he can show any old thing he wants and still make big money. As to the other houses on Madison street, it is another question. It was not long ago when the Alcazar, Casino and Pastime were laughing at the poor Boston Theater, with a poor patronage. Joseph Hopp, of the Standard Film Exchange, in giving good Independent service to the Boston, has turned the tables and now the Boston has the laugh on the three other houses. It is well known that the four houses in the block of Madison street, between Dearborn and Clark streets, have been bitter rivals and as soon as one of them makes a change the others follow. The question remains to see if the three other theaters are going to follow the Boston in securing an Independent service.

AMERICAN FILM COMPANY'S PRODUCTS.

Monday afternoon the first products of the American Film Manufacturing Company made their debut at the Boston Theater, Madison street, and were viewed by newspaper, exchange and a representative number of moving picture men. These pictures were shown in connection with the regular program, without any particular announcement to the audience, and were very well received. The American company have decided on a change in their release dates (see their announcement on another page); meanwhile the exhibitors look forward to securing some excellent and welcome additions to their programs.

It will never be possible to edit and conduct a public paper in a manner that will win universal endorsement or encouragement, nor to wholly escape adverse criticism. And this is not an original idea or declaration. If there was a newspaper in existence at any time during Adam's career its editor no doubt had experience in the same line, and although his list of subscribers may have been a very short one he found at times that they all had a grouch at some period or other. It has been the experience of editors through the ages. What is read with the greatest appreciation to-day may incite a riot to-morrow. The minds of the people undergo changes from day to day, perceptions become sharp and dull, alternately. If the stomach of the reader is in good trim to-day the editor wins, and if it is otherwise the pen driver finishes bad. In the latter case all praise is looked upon as either gross humor, ridicule, or a paid for puff, and honest criticism as direct and unqualified antagonism.

In some of my recent letters I have stated that any system of censorship that might be established by municipalities could not be more effective or give better satisfaction than under existing conditions, and to sustain the contention I cited the material comprising the present New York branch of the National Board of Censors. I have been criticized because I did not come out flat-footed and give unqualified endorsement to the movement on the part of the exhibitors' association in New York to have the Board of Aldermen appoint a board of censorship to review moving pictures before their production. This criticism, I am pleased to say, was not extensive. There were many exhibitors and others interested in the movement who were intelligent enough and who possessed perception of sufficient strength to see what I was driving at. I will now endeavor to place beform my critics a statement of facts that will convince them that if I failed to make myself sufficiently plain and agreeable I was at least guided by an honest purpose.

I do not contend that the request of the exhibitors for a censorship committee of municipal creation should not be granted. I do contend that such a step will open an avenue for graft and acts of injustice that is not in existence under present conditions and that if such a committee or board is created it should be governed by rules and regulations as fully binding and effective as those that may be made to guide and govern the manufacturers, film exchanges, or the exhibitors; and penalties for neglect, violations, or abuse of power should be fixed.

I also contend, and always have, that there should be no discrimination between the regular theaters and moving picture houses and when ordinances are being framed to govern the latter the other theaters should be taken into consideration when the conditions are similar. Since my last letter I have found that at least one member of the Board of Aldermen of New York agrees with me in this. A few days ago Alderman Becker introduced a resolution providing for the appointment by the Mayor of a committee of twenty-five to censor "all places of public amusement, dramas, plays, exhibitions, shows and entertainments." It is proposed to have the committee remain in office four years and to have the power to prohibit any performance considered immoral, or improper, and any manager offering such a show to be fined $100.

Nor is this the only instance in which my views on the censorship are reflected by others. A recognized authority —the London Spectator—publishes a case of failure on the part of official censorship which fits to a nicety the situation against which I have been directing attention. The paper says:

"The censor has failed, must have failed and always will fail, to achieve the object of a censorship (which we, of course, admit to be excellent in itself) because he is an irresponsible official exercising a secret and arbitrary power. Such a function is bound to become mechanical, and therefore mischievous. The censor in recent years has passed many unpleasant plays and others which deal with breaches of the Seventh Commandment, but has prohibited plays which treated painful subjects sincerely and candidly or which introduced a Scriptural character. Thus the most reverent representation of Christian subjects is refused by rule of thumb, while a piece full of levity and indifferent morals is often admitted."

I trust what I have stated in this letter will convince my critics that anything I may have previously written regarding municipal censorship was not prompted by any personal partisanship toward the existing system of censorship, or a desire to be antagonistic for the purpose of having something upon which to write. Recent developments, as quoted in this letter, have sufficiently confirmed my views to convince anyone who is open to conviction, that whatever I have written upon the subject contains enough merit to warrant sincere consideration during the preliminaries leading up to the creation of a municipal board of censors. Protection should be given the manufacturers of films against any possible unwarranted delay on the part of censors whereby the manufacturers may be hindered in placing their subjects upon the market. The same protection should be given film exchanges and selling agents so that they may not be subjected to unnecessary loss by being unable to supply their patrons with new subjects. The age of film subjects is just as an important a factor to the exchange man and sales agent as quality and quantity. A better price can be secured for a film given an exhibitor when it is first placed upon the market than when it is a week old. Now this statement must not be misunderstood. It is subject to two constructions. Under one it appears quite ridiculous and under the other it is equally sensible. If the censors should hold up a subject for three months it would be just as new and have the same money earning and drawing power at the expiration of that time as it would the day the manufacturer first completed it, providing a subject based upon the same story and made by another manufacturer had not been allowed to slip through the board in the meantime. But should new subjects before being tied up in the censorship board through unnecessary delay in the performance of its duties and the exchanges should become crippled for want of sufficient supply of new films every day of such hindrance will mean so much pecuniary loss to the exchanges when the first, second or third-run service failes the price the exchange gets from the exhibitor drops. As the stock markets govern trades, so the calendar governs the business of the exchange man and sales agent. And it controls the business of the exhibitor with the same effect. The moving picture audiences are constantly clamoring for new subjects. They want frequent changes of programs and will rarely stand for repeaters. Headliners must be changed every day and commercials must not run too close together, or when walking out of the theater the people will tell the manager in no mistakable tone that he had better get something new. The manager too well knows what this means and if he fails to act upon the hint his box office will soon suffer an attack of acute decline.

Now all this chatter, as some may call it, is of importance to the manufacturer, exchange man, sales agent and exhibitor. And many other points of equal importance could be cited, but space will not permit reference to them at this time. One vital point must not escape, however. It is embodied in the reference to possible losses to be sustained should the censors lag in their work, but may not have been noticed by some readers. Mark the point well. The creation of the censors' board and its rules and regulations should not be left entirely in the hands of the Board of Aldermen, most of whom know nothing, or very little, of the conditions affecting the interests of the people engaged in the moving picture business, and these people should see that these conditions are properly placed before the municipal body as a guide for fair and impartial regulations. The picture people should guard themselves against the troublesome situations a German friend of mine used to meet with quite frequently when he would deal only with present conditions and give no heed to the future. When receiving the sympathy of friends he would remark, after a heavy sigh, "Vell, id iss a grade blace vere nobody lifs and efrybody's boss."

"Mammon's the master, and man is the slave, toiling for wealth on the brink of the grave." These are two lines from a favorite song of mine called "The Diver," which, when he is in the mood, your Lux Graphicus sings with very fine effect. For, to my many other accomplishments, I add that of being a singer, and a very good singer, too, if I am to believe what other people say. Had my friend, Carl Laemmle, called upon me the other evening at his dinner to sing a song I should have been very happy to oblige. I had my words and music with me ready for the call, and I am sure that when Homer Howard, of the music house of Laemmle, who was present, has heard me sing, he will instantly engage me to sing some of the Laemmle songs. It is not too late, Howard. "Let me hear from you."

Now, there you go again, reader, asking, as you have asked before, and probably will ask again, What has all this to do with the moving picture? And I say to you again, as I have said before, in the words of Shakespeare, "It has all to do with the moving picture." At the moment while I am dictating this article, I ache in every limb; I cannot turn my head without pain, and life looks blue and almost into the regions of the ultra violet. No! It is not on account of the Laemmle dinner, and what took place there; my aches and my pains and state of mind have been superinduced by my devotion to duty on the morning after the night before.

Very often, when I am humming the refrain of "The Diver," I have wondered to myself whether a real diving subject has ever been filmed, and on inquiry I find that it has been done: that the picture was taken from a submarine, especially chartered for the purpose. To me there has always been something especially weird and uncanny about marine diving work. Indeed, about all kinds of subaqueous and subterranean work. To be cut off from the world for so many hours a day, in search of a living, to keep you on the earth for a few fleeting years! Isn't it a strange way of passing existence?

Marine diving, then having been done by the film man, how many more worlds has he to conquer? We have had battles, fires, earthquakes, all the great calamities, incidents and happenings of the earth filmed. When I say all, I mean nearly all. We have yet to have Tennyson's "Airy Navies Grappling in the Central Blue." In other words: an aeroplane or an airship war. But that will come. Nothing is sacred to the moving picture photographer.

Cold blew the wind one afternoon this last week. I stood out in the Autumn blast, for an hour or more, watching the preparation of the newest film sensation. And so interested was I in watching what I saw, that I took the cold of which I am now complaining, and which has reduced me, for the nonce, to a perambulating mass of aches and pains. But never mind! I would not have missed the sight for anything. I would not have missed the sight of J. S. Blackton and Mr. Thompson, one of his producers, surrounded by a heterogenous staff, sitting on planks on the Vitagraph lake, supervising the filming of the incidents taking place in a submerged coal mine. The structure, I may explain, was built up on the Vitagraph lake, and the supreme incident that we all stood watching was being enacted at the mouth of a cavernous looking mine.

Towards that mouth the attentions of Blackton, Thompson, cameramen, onlookers and helpers was concentrated. For, in the water, was a miner with his kindled lamp on his head. The picture had arrived at that stage of production when it was necessary to show the hero gradually succumbing to the encroachments of the remorseless rising water. There he was for an hour or two listening to the directions of Manager Blackton and Director Thompson, while all the preparations were going on outside and around the roof of the mine. Rather a cold, moist job on a very Autumnal afternoon! No wonder they sent for some whiskey for him and sent for it more than one. Even I, a mere onlooker, could have done with a drop of the crature. Only I do not drink whiskey. I like tea, and the wine that is red.

The man in the water, practically rehearsed his part in the water, listening carefully and intelligently to the directions of Mr. Blackton and Mr. Thompson. Then came the moment when the handle of the camera was to be turned by Mr. "Walter," who presided over the instrument on two little planks over the water. Three pictures of the suffering miner were taken, showing him in various stages of agony, right up to the final scene when the water reaches his lips and presumably life ebbs away. Then, when it was all over, he crawled out of the water looking like a drowned rat, obviously exhausted and making quickly for his dressing room to change his clothing and, I hope, to have a deep draught of whiskey. He certainly deserved it. He had earned his money.

"Mammon's the master, and man is the slave." This line is of course universally applicable. If I were to dilate upon it I should be writing platitudes. So I won't. No doubt my amphibious friend in the Vitagraph lake took pleasure in his work. It made me shiver to look at it. Similarly, haven't we all read that the man who worked on the pinnacle of the Metropolitan Tower liked his work. That steeplejacks, real miners, real divers, soldiers, sailors and others whose work necessarily brings them into positions of discomfort and danger, really like what they have to go through? So, why should we shrug our shoulders and pity these people; talk of danger, risks to health and the like. Use is second nature, and I have no doubt that my subaqueous friend of Vitagraph land is willing, for a consideration, to repeat the dose, not forgetting the whiskey.

The moral is, of course, that the modern film maker has to exercise extraordinary ingenuity and resource in order to gratify the desire of the great moving picture public for fresh, original, startling subjects. Just fancy now, in cold blood, a business firm enacting completely, thoroughly, and almost to the foot of the letter, the spectacle of a submerged miner meeting his death, so to speak, before the very eyes of the staff, and devoting days to the preparation of the simulated mine, etc! Yet, this little scene only forms one part of a forthcoming Vitagraph release. How little the great public, for whom these pictures are made, realizes what a mine of inventiveness, forethought, and concentrated effort are demanded in the preparation of these pictures! Incidents such as I am describing are no mere child's play; it is all jolly hard work and jolly cold work, as I can testify this moment, in virtue of all my aches and pains, contracted through my observing interest in the Vitagraph scene of the submerged miner. Atishoo! Atishoo! The very thought of it makes me shiver and sneeze!

Detroit, Mich.—The Empire Theater has been repainted throughout and its interior decorations, in green and gold, are, without doubt, the most refined and artistic of any moving picture house in the city. This was the first theater in America to install a mirror screen.

The management of Cairo's pretty Gem Theater, on Eighth street, are still making improvements at that popular resort. Recently they received and installed a Mercury Arc Rectifier in their picture producing apparatus, which transforms the alternating electric current to a direct current, throwing the picture upon the curtain more clearly and more steadily.

FILMS WILL PAY DUTY AS PHOTOGRAPHS, NOT AS CELLULOID.

Moving picture films made in Europe will now come into the United States at a much lower rate of duty than heretofore. The Customs Court, Washington, on October 28 decided the films should be assessed as photographs at a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem. The Board of General Appraisers at New York had contended that they were dutiable as celluloid at a much higher rate.

THE IMP HAS A BIRTHDAY PARTY.

The first Imp picture was released on October 25, 1909, and so to celebrate this interesting and historical landmark in the history of the company, and in the history of the moving picture industry of the United States, if not of the world, it was resolved by Carl Laemmle and Mr. Cochrane to celebrate the occasion in the time-honored fashion by a little dinner.

As we made our way to the banquet hall in the Imperial Hotel, Broadway, New York City, we were in some doubt as to the exact nature of the festivity, to which we had been invited by telephone by our very own Miss O'Keefe. Was it to be a trade dinner to which the Imp officials had invited some of their friendly competitors? Was it to be limited to a select few of the Imp people? What was it to be? The question was answered for us in a very agreeable fashion when we took our seats in the dining room. For Carl Laemmle, to our unconcealed pleasure and surprise, was presiding over a very large family party of Imps, representing all departments of the business in New York City, and numbering considerably over one hundred.

Supporting Mr. Laemmle were Tom Cochrane (general manager), Miss O'Keefe, Mr. Smiley and Mr. McGlynn, producers, the popular Doc. Willat and Mrs. Willat, the acting staff, the office staff and all the departments of the business which make the making of the Imp film from the time it leaves the camera to the time when it is ready for the screen, the business of their lives.

The press was represented by J. P. Chalmers and Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S., of the Moving Picture World; Leon J. Rubenstein, of Film Reports; Frank Winch, of The Billboard, and Alfred H. Saunders, of The Moving Picture News. There were also present, Mr. and Mrs. Homer Howard, Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Brown, representing the music house of Laemmle. A very delightful little dinner was served, and an agreeable novelty introduced in the shape of a cradled Imp, holding the ice cream. The joke of the evening was that next year this cradle would have to be doubled.

After dinner Mr. Laemmle in a short introductory speech disclaimed being any orator, but expressed the pleasure it gave him on being present at the occasion. He looked forward to being also present next October 25 to celebrate the second annual dinner of the Imp business.

After Mr. Laemmle had concluded, a torrent of delightful, unconventional oratory was let loose. Mr. Cochrane acted as toastmaster and appropriately introduced each speaker. Following the representatives of the press, who congratulated the Imp Company on its success, all departments of the business were represented, amongst the speakers being producers, actors and actresses, cameramen, artists, painters, carpenters, darkroom staff, the film joining department, and so on throughout the entire series of branches of the Imp business, concluding with the ever popular Miss O'Keefe, who said a few words.

In the course of many speeches that he had to make, Mr. Cochrane gave a brief and sympathetic account of the start of the Imp business in New York City. It began by the purchase of a table and a typewriter. Then, as we all know, the genial Tom got busy. He and those associated with him had every reason to be proud on Tuesday night when contemplating the happy family that he and those who work with him got together in such a short space of time. Any reader of this account of the dinner who looks at the accompanying reproduced photograph, will bear us out when we say that it is something of an achievement in so short a space of time to have organized a business which allows of such a delightful first annual celebration as that which was held last Tuesday evening by the Imp people. We hope with all those who were present, that the little Imp will grow and flourish, that next year the dinner will have doubled in size and Carl Laemmle will be smiling more broadly and proudly than ever.

We might, in conclusion, say that the speeches throughout the evening were chiefly of a humorous character. One of them in particualr stands out clearly and distinctly as quite the best thing of the kind heard done. One of the acting staff was called upon to make a speech. Replying that it was something unusual for a moving picture actor to have to make a speech, he conveyed his reply in dumb show; that is to say, he acted instead of speaking. And he acted so extraordinarily well that he brought down the house and received quite the heartiest applause of the evening. This silently eloquent orator's name is Robert Miles. He may consider himself immortal.

The Empire Theater, Brattleboro, Vt., has installed a new American Standard moving picture machine this week.

From Oklahoma.—Stillwater, Okla., contributes the following: "Friend Richardson—I have just finished reading the Trouble Department of the Moving Picture World, something that every moving picture man, be he owner or operator, should do. I have found the Department to be a great help and we even save the old issues of the World so as to have the columns of the Department for reference.

"I note in October 8 issue where our brother at Winnipeg, Canada, bakes his condensing lenses in an oven to temper them, and it strikes me as a distinctly good scheme. Think I shall bake a few myself, as we usually have several on hand. I am operating at the Firemen's Theater in this city. Have everything nice, plenty of room, good films, and above all else, a well pleased audience. Have no one to dictate or bother me in my work and can truthfully say I am monarch of all I survey when the door of the operating booth is closed. We run no vaudeville, nor do we intend to. The manager says he prefers giving his money to the operator and the film exchange rather than to a doubtful vaudeville performance. We are getting just as good houses as if we paid $90 or $100 for vaudeville. In fact, there is a vaudeville-picture house just across the street from us. Still, we cannot ask for better business. I have been running nearly a year, so you see we have fully tested the matter.

"When I say we, I mean we. If the operator is not entitled to this term we in speaking of the house with which he is connected, I am sure I do not know who is, though he may not have any financial interest in the theater other than his weekly pay check. As for troubles, I have plenty of them, but never let the audience know it if it can be avoided. My motto is and has been, 'Find and remedy your trouble between shows, take good care of your film, show an interest in the house and your work,' and the house will reciprocate by showing interest in you."

A very good letter, indeed, Stillwater. We are, of course, glad you find the Trouble Department useful and trust you may continue so to do. In keeping the old issues of the World on file you not only are able to refer to this Department, but you are also able to look up the release date and description of any old film you may, for any reason, desire to resurrect. More than this, the Trouble Department of the World is not the only good feature by any manner of means, though I hope it is one of the good features, and perhaps one of the best features. Every week the editorials contain most excellent articles for reading and thinking over, Every week the department of "Lux Graphicus" and "Man-About-Town" have things of more than ordinary interest. In fact, we believe the World to be a well balanced paper, full of genuine meat from cover to cover, and the editors of the paper are bending every energy to make it that kind of a publication and to maintain its present standing at the head of the moving picture literature. Your experience as regards pictures and vaudeville is but a repetition of many other men's experiences. There is absolutely no need for vaudeville where good films are run, and those good films are properly projected, in all that that term implies. Come again, Stillwater; glad to hear from you at any time.

An Automatic Rewinding Tension Device.—J. B. Masse, of Kalispell, Mont., sends in the following: "Enclosed find sketch of an automatic device equalizing the tension of the take-up in rewinding. I think this device will work on all machines. At least, I know it worked on three different makes of machines. I would like to have this sketch printed in the columns of the Trouble Department, since I believe any operator with a little expenditure of gray matter may easily equip his machine with the same. I believe, also, that if all operators would use such an arrangement they would not butcher up so much film by having the take-up belt too tight. A leather take-up belt will dry up and shrink during the day, and while it is in that condition the operator starts up and what happens to the film is a shame to tell. The operator says to himself, 'Well, this is the only night I run the film anyhow, so what do I care'; and the work of destruction goes merrily on."

The device shown in the sketch looks as if it would work all right and no doubt many operators will be glad to avail themselves of the opportunity to build one for their own machine. The thousands of readers of the World are certainly indebted to neighbor Masse for his sketch. It is an unquestioned fact that an enormous amount of damage is done to film through excessive tension at the beginning of the run; that is to say, the take-up tension nuts must be set tight enough to rewind all film. This means that it must be tight enough to revolve the reel after it is full of film and the leverage against the tension is a great many times what it is at the beginning when the film roll is very small. A moment's thought will show you that under such conditions the pull on the film at the beginning of the run, when the film is winding merely on the hub of the take-up wheel, is very heavy. Not only does this excessive strain injure the film itself by scratching it, but it makes more likely the loosing of the lower loop.

The sketches submitted by Neighbor Masse are, I believe, plain enough to be understood by almost anyone.

Longer Throw.—North Yakima, Wash., writes as follows: "I am taking the liberty of enclosing a stamped and addressed envelope for reply, as I desire to make the change I shall question you about before I could get information through the paper. We have a room 23½ by 120 feet, 16-foot ceiling, of which we are at present using 80 feet. Before the first of November, however, we shall move the screen to the extreme rear of the building, which will mean 110-foot throw instead of 70 feet. as at present (our machine being 10 feet inside the building line). We would like to know what would be a proper size for picture, floor being inclined for 80 feet of the distance. Also what size projecting, condensing and stereo. lens to throw a picture the size you would advise. Thanking you in advance and wishing you (and incidentally the World) success, I am,

Now, here is a man who undoubtedly and unquestionably would not willingly seek to impose upon anyone. He encloses a postage stamp and asks me to reply to certain questions that would require sketches and a lot of explanation, the figuring out of lens sizes, etc., all of which would consume anywhere from 30 minutes to two hours, to say nothing of the time of the stenographer. This gentleman does not realize that there are 10,000 moving picture theaters in the United States and that he is not the only one who writes to their good friend Richardson for information and advice. The fact of the matter is, if I complied with all such requests I would not be able to do much of anything else but write letters. As a matter of fact, I have to earn my living just like anybody else, and much as I would like to, I cannot do these things. I am paid to answer questions through the columns of the world and am glad to do so and to help anyone all I possibly can, but I must insist that where information is wanted by mail, sufficient money must be enclosed to cover the cost. This is not because I am penurious, it is simply a business proposition. My mail contains anywhere from five to twenty such requests each and every day in the week, 365 days in the year, and I have merely used my good friend Yakima's letter as an illustration, for which I hope he will forgive me.

Now, as regards the letter itself. It is impossible to answer intelligently from the data at hand. You said the floor sloped for 80 feet, but you did not say whether this slope was built on top of the floor, thus leaving only 16 feet of depth from the floor to ceiling at the front, or whether it sloped down so as to give a greater depth at the curtain end of the house. I would refer you to sketch on page 470, issue of August 27. With a room 120 feet long you should have your picture, if possible, 18 feet wide, or even 20 feet would not be too much, though I think I should prefer the 18-foot size. Now, an 18-foot picture would not be, of course, anywhere near 18 feet in depth. The width and height of the picture is exactly in proportion to the width and height of the aperture plate; the aperture plate is 15/16 wide by 11/16 high, so that with an 18-foot picture the problem would be as 15/16 is to 11/16 so is 18 feet to X, "X" being the height of the picture. This would, of course, make your picture between 12 and 13 feet high. Referring to the sketch on page 470, the light ray must be high enough at the front row of seats so that the head of a standing man or woman will not interfere with the picture. You may, of course, throw your picture clear up to the ceiling, though this is hardly advisable, unless absolutely necessary. Having determined the size of picture, figure your lenses as follows: Multiply the throw in feet (distance from screen to lens) by the exact width of the aperture in fractions of an inch, calipering the aperture to be sure you get it exactly right, since even so little as a sixty-fourth of an inch will make considerable difference in that length throw. Divide the result so obtained by the desired width of the picture in feet. The result will be the equivalent focus (E. F.) of the required lens. Figure the stereo. lens exactly the same way, only take 3 as the width of the aperture, since the standard slide mat is 3 inches in width. This rule is as accurate as anything you can use. But there is likely to be some slight variation, since the cheap lenses are not accurately ground. Use two 7½ condensing lenses.

The main thing is to get your picture as large as possible without having the bottom of it so low that the audience cannot see it or that the heads of people entering or leaving will interfere with the picture.

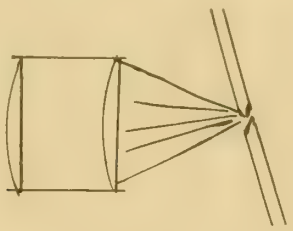
Problem Solved.—Jackson, Mich., sends in the following: "Here is a proposition, upon which I am stuck, and stuck bad. While in another operating room, recently, I noticed a peculiar thing, for which none of the operators here have any explanation, confining their remarks to the statement that it is wrong.

"The operator has his condensing lenses in with the flat side of each one toward the light, as per the following diagram:



"What I would like to know is, how do the light rays pass through condensers set as these are, and how much, if any, light would be lost? Why does this operator run with 60 amperes where the rest used but 35?"

This, Jackson, is quite an interesting problem. At first glance it would seem that there would be considerable loss of light. I have decided, however, instead of answering your question, to pass this matter up to the readers of The Column. Let them dig into it and see what they get out. Let's have your answer to this problem, friends, as soon as possible.

An Outrage.—New York City writes as follows: "I held a position in a theater recently where the regular thing was to run eight reels of pictures and two songs in one hour. I held that particular job just one week and then told the manager I thought the pace was too slow, and quit. What do you think of that kind of a proposition?"

I think, my dear boy, you should have been punished for exceeding the speed limit. I believe that the actors you were putting through the paces on the screen could have sued you for larceny, arson or bigamy and made a case on any one of the counts, and I believe the audience could have lynched you with good grace and that act would have been entirely justifiable. You wanted my opinion, and there you are! Seriously, however, such a proposition as that is an outrage. More than that, it is very closely approaching a swindle on the public who are paying their money to see a show. Eight reels and two songs in an hour! Counting the two songs as constituting a total of eight minutes, that would leave 52 minutes for eight reels of film, or a little more than six minutes to the reel. I am a little bit afraid your eyes were bigger than your stomach in this matter, as the saying it, unless the film was in very excellent condition, and I doubt if you could put it through a machine in that length of time. Of course, with new film it could be done all right enough, but with old film I very much doubt the practicability of any such performance. At any rate, the theater manager who would insist on such work, or even tolerate such a performance, ought to be kicked off the projection map. He is a disgrace to the business and a menace to it as well. It is such "critters" as this that give the motion picture business a black eye and cheapen it with the public. I do hope the day will come when the public will know what constitutes good projection and refuse to pay their money to see any other kind.

Film Jumps.—Webster, S. Dak., writes as follows: "Will some kind operator tell me through the Trouble Department the cause for the jumping and jerking of a picture on the screen, and how to remedy same?"

I guess we won't bother any of the kind operators with this particular proposition, especially inasmuch as Webster doesn't say what kind of a machine he has or give any any other data whatsover, but will try to answer it ourselves as best we may. One prolific cause for the film jumping is dirt on the face of the intermittent sprocket. I have seen operators (?) allow gum and dirt to collect on the face of the intermittent sprocket half the depth of the spurs and then wonder why their picture jumps. The jerking may also be caused by improperly adjusted tension springs, or tension springs too weak. It may be also the result of imperfect perforation in the film itself, and there are other causes. If Webster expects an intelligent reply, he must send all available data.

Intermittent Sprocket or Gate Out of Line.—Alamosa, Col., writes as follows: "I am not having much trouble now, thanks to information supplied by yourself. Since I put in new tension springs, however, I notice the sprocket holes show on the screen. I put back the old spring, but it stili shows."

Alamosa says considerable more, but was a little careless with his writing and I cannot make it out. As near as I can get at it, he either remedied or attempted to remedy the matter by loosening the screws holding the aperture plate and setting it over a little. This might accomplish the result all right, but it is the wrong way to go about it. Your sprocket holes, Alamosa, showed for the reason that (a) your intermittent sprocket is out of line with the aperture—that is to say, sets too far to one side; (b) the top idler of the gate is out of line with the aperture. Either one or both of these conditions are quite possible, and if bad enough would cause the sprocket holes to show. The remedy is simple and obvious: line up the sprocket and top gate idler with the aperture.

The Same Old Story.—Havre de Grace, Md., writes as follows: "I am always glad to get the World, as I have received a great deal of information from it. I have learned from it how to overcome a great many of my troubles, but still have one which I have not yet succeeded in solving. I show a 10 by 12 picture and cannot get a good focus all over the screen. A strip about one foot wide on the left hand side of the picture is out of focus when the rest of the picture is sharp. My machine sets in the center? Can you tell me anything that will help in this matter?"

Well, neighbor, I don't know whether I can or not. I have been chasing this particular trouble around the stump for quite some time, and I believe I am beginning to get the "critter" cornered at last. In the last issue of the Trouble Department appeared one solution, and I have now succeeded in discovering another, or rather it was discovered for me by Mr. Atwater of the Nicholas Power Company, to whom is due my thanks in the matter. Get a stick of ordinary chalk and grind some of it up on a rough board, so as to make fine powder of it; talcum powder will do just as well. Take out your projection lens and drop some of it on the front lens and then empty it out again. This will leave the front lens with a slight layer of chalk or powder. Now, put the lens back in the machine, turn on the light. open the gate of the machine and let the white light shine through. Look in the end of the lens and you will see on the front of the lens the image of the aperture. If this appears central, all right; if, on the other hand, it appears to one side, as per sketch, very likely that is the cause of your difficulty.

I just discovered this to-day, and I do not yet know what causes the trouble, nor how to remedy it, though I shall proceed with further investigation as soon as possible. Meanwhile, you might experiment along these lines and let us know what result is derived from your experiment. If you find this is not the seat of your trouble, communicate with me further and I will see what can be done.

From Far-Off Winnipeg.—Winnipeg, Can., sends in the following: "Thank you very much for the information received through the Trouble Department, which I like very much, and think that all operators and managers would be better off if they followed more closely your advice. I am sending you two snapshots of our cozy little theater and I think you will find it compares favorably with the majority of houses for outside appearance. The front is done in marble, with etched plate glass mirrors and tile flooring, with the name of the theater worked in it."

Glad you appreciate The Column, Winnipeg. Your theater front is certainly charming. Wish I could drop in on you and shake hands with that classy looking bunch in front of the box office.

A Correction.—San Francisco, Cal., calls the editor down as follows: "Friend Richardson, I do not mean this as a correction, but merely as a suggestion. On page 870, October 15 issue, you sketch a wiring diagram for our friend in Weatherford, Okla. Enclosed find drawing of how I would do that particular job. I think it will meet with your approval. In your plan there is too much room to forget, and with the average operator, you know what would happen. There would either be excessive bills for fuses or a bill for re-winding an armature, in case the fuses didn't go when the operator [illegible] switch No. 2 of your diagram and forgot to pull switch No. 1; or, perhaps when he started his generator he forgot to pull switch No. 3 and then took half an hour finding out why he had no light, or maybe he forgot to close No. 4 and burned a coil or two in the theater when he started to use city juice. You say, use padlocks. That is all right, but I am of the opinion that it would take more than padlocks to prevent some sort of an accident.

"Instead of publishing my drawing, I would like you to first get the boys to thinking by asking for submission of sketches showing how to make the connection shown on page 870, October 15 issue, by using a three pole double throw switch, as I have done."

Frisco is absolutely right, and I accept his letter as a correction rather than a suggestion. He sends on an excellent sketch in which by the use of a triple pole, double throw switch, everything is accomplished that can be accomplished by the sketch on page 870. He is wrong, however, in one thing. The failure to pull switch No. 3 when using the theater generator would simply mean that he would get too much current, that being direct current; whereas, on the other hand, if he left it open while operating on city alternating current, means he would not get enough current. There would be no damage done to the rheostat or anything else, except the picture, in either event. I should really like to publish his sketch, as it is a very ingenious piece of wiring, but I believe with him that it would do more good to ask the readers of The Column to try to figure this thing out for themselves. The problem is how to use a triple pole, double throw switch so that by throwing the switch one way, current is taken from the city mains through two rheostats in multiple, whereas by throwing the switch the other way, current is taken from the theater generator through one of the rheostats only, there being but two rheostats altogether.

I accept Frisco's letter as a correction because I should have taken time to have submitted a better scheme than I did. However, my idea was merely to show Weatherford how the thing could be done, leaving him to figure out the best ways of doing it. That is not an excuse, but merely a statement. The sketch submitted by Frisco will be published later on.

Film Trouble Again.—La Fayette, Col., writes as follows: "I have been a reader of The Column for some time and have received many useful hints therefrom. It is a splendid thing for operators, whether they imagine they know it all or not. I believe there are a good many of them in this neck of the woods who could reap much benefit by studying it a little. I want a little advice concerning the No. 1 1908 Model Motiograph. My picture will be out of focus, first on one side, then on the other, both of which may occur in from fifteen to twenty feet of film. Have new aperture plate and new tension springs at present, but it does just the same. Spring seems to ride squarely on the tracks.

Glad you like the Department, La Fayette. As to the trouble, I can see no reason why film should act this way in your machine, unless it is due to the condition described on page 990, October 29. I don't remember just how the film is held at the top of the Motiograph gate, but believe it goes down between a couple of flanged rollers. Possibly these rollers are set a little too narrow, buckling the film as it passes through. It is also possible that your tension springs are not held tightly and sway from side to side. One of these three things ought to fit your case. If not, kindly communicate with me further.

Wires Burn Off.—Denver, Col., nearly shook me off the limb. He asks what makes wires burn off inside the lamp house; says he has an Economizer and sometimes burns off as many as three wires a day. That part of it is all right, but then he goes on and covers three pages with verse. The verse is excellent and I wanted very much to publish it, but was unable, owing to the fact that the stenographer broke six pencils trying to take dictation and then went on a strike. So far as the wire is concerned, you are using too small a wire for the current. You probably are using a 60-ampere contacting with a No. 8 wire into your lamp house. Change the No. 8 to a No. 6, or else double the No. 8, is my advice. A No. 8 wire is rated to carry only 33 amperes of current. Naturally when you undertake to force 50 or 60 amperes through it and add to the natural heat generated by overloading the wire, the heat from the arc, the wire is going to burn off. I have even seen some operators try to use a No. 10 wire with a 60-ampere contact in an inductor and then wonder why their wire is burned off.

TOLEDO FILM EXCHANGE COMPANY.

Reception Room.

General Office.

President Smith's Private Office.

If a man's home is the key to his character, his office may be said to reflect his business characteristics This being so, H. F. Smith, president of the Toledo Film Exchange Company, must be one of the most substantial and methodical of film men. The exchange is located in a substantial building, the entrance is inviting, Mr. Smith's neighbors are substantial men, the furniture of the exchange is substantial and Mr. Smith, himself, looks the part and wears a pleasant smile and air of confidence and reserve force that goes with the truly successful man of business.

The elevator lands you in the reception room, a large front room, well lighted and ventilated, and so comfortably furnished that anyone feels at home and hates to leave the place. Entering from this is the general office, finished in hardwood and fine grillwork, behind which a bevy of charming young ladies attend to your needs and cheerfully receipt the bills. Adjoining this is the correspondence room, where we find several stenographers busy all day, taking dictation from either Mr. H. E. Smith, the president, or from his able assistant, and answering the daily voluminous correspondence, as the Toledo Film Exchange covers a large territory.

The private office of Mr. H. E. Smith is a very cozy place, a real nest. The modern new furniture matches the hardwood finish and the dark wall paper. Numerous photos and pictures add a good deal to the charm of the president's office. Adjoining is another similar cozy office, the private sanctum of Mr. Smith's manager, and in the rear is a third office, specially devoted to the slides. Plenty of room, shelves and pigeon-holes for the slides and sheets of music, and the beauty of this room is very good light and ventilation. In fact, light and ventilation seem to have been the first care of Mr. Smith; he wants his seventeen employees to work in a flow of natural light with plenty of fresh air. There is not a dark corner in the entire second floor and the ventilation is the best everywhere.

Next to the slide department, we find the exhibition room, furnished with a regulation booth and a new No. 6 Power's machine, as Mr. Smith, to maintain his reputation for serving high-class pictures only, wants to see every new release submitted to him, before he makes his purchases. The illustration shows the machine and stock room, with plenty of space to work and examine the machines and goods.

We reach the poster department, and here Mr. Smith has devised a clever system of racks by which his posters are kept in good order.

The rear room is perhaps the pearl of the establishment. We have here a long working bench at which four young ladies are busily engaged examining the reels, and as they have plenty of daylight and fresh air, their work seems easy, not to say pleasant. While three of the young ladies do the examining and patching, the work of the fourth employee is to rewind the reels, and this is no great exertion on her part, except watching, as the rewinding is done by motor.

The last department is the sign shop, where under the supervision of a man experienced with the brush and full of good ideas, some of the best signs are turned out, even for the licensed houses.

If Toledo has a factory inspector, this official could find no fault with Mr. Smith's establishment, as nothing more could be desired for the comfort of the employees and for the safety of a film service. We hope that many of the exchanges will try to imitate Mr. Smith, and if they do so, they will soon see an increase in their business.

That moving pictures seem a reality to the young mind was manifested the other afternoon when the picture of a man carrying a woman after she had fallen from her horse was thrown on the screen. A child who sat behind me exclaimed out loud. "Oh, mamma, that big girl ought to be ashamed of herself to have to be carried like a baby."—Boston "Post."

A NEW SIGN.

A real attraction is now on exhibition in the rooms of our Western offices, 160 Washington street, Chicago, Ill. This sign is the admiration of every visitor and the terms by which it is named are proof that the new device has caught the exhibitor. Some call it "classic," others "the most artistic sign," still others" the neatest and mast tasteful arrangement," etc.

The sign is made to be placed across the front of a theater. It will give the title of the feature film in clear bold red or black letters and at the same time will show real scenes from the film in colors. Actual scenes, no imaginary compositions like the posters. The sign can be changed in a few minutes and any child can be taught how to work it. The sign also offers some vacant spaces that can be filled with announcements, notices, price of admission, picture of the singer, picture of the leading man or actress, etc.

The sign in itself will not be a very cheap proposition, as everything will be of the best workmanship, but, in the long run, it will be the cheapest sign, as very little light is required to work it. The original cost will be even less than the present electric signs.

This sign is on exhibition only for a few weeks.

In the very near future several schemes of how to decorate theaters will be placed on exhibition in the rooms of our Chicago offices and also a practical demonstration of the side lights.

Remember that these rooms are free to all persons interested in motion pictures. They are not sales rooms but a free exhibition, where managers can find mostly anything pertaining to moving pictures. Free to the consumer and free to the manufacturer.

ST. LOUIS.

Although my passage through St. Louis was a hurried one, I was well impressed with the moving picture theaters. In the downtown district the theaters seem to stick to two principles that I would like to see repeated in other towns, viz.: Only good pictures and no vaudeville and a 10-cent admission.

While 5 cents was a satisfactory admission for the small old-style store front theaters, with a program of not over 30 minutes, the 10-cent admission is fully justified, when we consider the longer program, better quality of pictures and the great comfort offered in the new large houses. Ten cents is not too much for a solid hour of the best pictures.

The Casino, not the largest, but one of the oldest and prettiest houses of St. Louis, is doing an excellent business under the able management of Ernst M. Hannauer. The neatly uniformed attendants are very courteous to every one. When I asked to see the manager they showed me to the office. The first thing that caught my eye was an open copy of the Moving Picture World on the desk of the manager and Mr. Hannauer seemed pleased that I should have caught him reading his favorite guide. Yes, Mr Hannauer claims to read the paper from the first to the last page, and in showing me the collection of Moving Picture Worlds stacked on his desk, he told me that he would be at a loss if he should miss a copy.

Although I thank Mr. Hannauer for his good and kind remarks, I can say that they were not needed as, for a trained observer, I could see that the manager had followed our advice. His neat, polite and well uniformed attendants represent what we have always advocated, and we cannot enough impress our readers on the advisability of uniforming their ushers, if they want to gain the confidence of their patrons. The music was quite well rendered by an orchestra of several pieces with a leader that knows how to suit the music to the pictures.

If it had not been for the fact that I had to cut short my visit to our friends of St. Louis, I would have enjoyed spending an evening with Mr. Hannauer, as you seldom meet a manager of motion pictures so well posted on all the details and so willing to do anything to help others.

Eugene L. Hammerstein, of the New St. Charles Theater, granted me another very interesting interview, and here, again, I would have been pleased to spend an evening. The St. Charles is a new theater with a unique front, in which the gingerbread decorations are advantageously replaced by more artistic and more imposing features.

As the manager of the De Luxe Theater was not in I could not pay him my respects, yet I had time to look at the exterior of his house, finished in a sort of Chinese style.

The Gem, under the able management of F. Talbot, is coining money and at night you can see a string of automobiles in front of the house, showing that the best society of St. Louis is not averse to motion pictures. A feature that will please many of our friends is that Mr. Talbot shows Independent pictures and it seems, notwithstanding, the constant rumors to the contrary, that Mr. Talbot can secure enough good Independent films to insure a daily first class program.

Opposite the Gem is the Lyric, also managed by Mr. Talbot, and although licensed pictures are shown, the visitors seem to go first to the Gem.

The Central is another well conducted theater, showing licensed films, and with an extra large lobby that can be closed during the bad season and offer a comfortable refuge to visitors having to wait for seats.

If the Independents have a good showing in St. Louis it is due to the fact that when the licenses of the Crawford and Western Exchanges were cancelled by the Motion Picture Patents Company these exchanges consolidated with the Swanson Film Exchange and also bought the Wagner Film Exchange, offering then to the Independent side a powerful exchange, able to buy in large quantities and, as said in previous letters, this is the key to the situation. The Independent manufacturers have shown that they were able to produce pictures as good, if not better, than certain licensed manufacturers but they needed good exchanges to buy freely. The exhibitors have never been opposed to the Independents, but thy did not care to abandon the licensed ranks until assured of a good Independent service and this could not be promised with exchanges going on one leg. The Swanson-Crawford Film Company is a good start, the H. & H. and the Standard of Chicago followed and, before long the Independents will have a full quota of buying exchanges.

THE MIRROR SCREEN.

Soblosky Bros., Norristown, Pa., have placed orders for two mirror screens for their theaters. Mr. Charles Calehuff, manager of one of the General Film Company offices in Philadelphia, is so favorably impressed with the mirror screen that he has issued 600 invitations to a demonstration. This will no doubt lead to a number of mirror screens being installed in and around Philadelphia before the close of the year.

IMITATION

is the SINCEREST FORM OF FLATTERY—And We Are MOST SINCERELY FLATTERED!

To IMITATE or to APPROPRIATE—That's

THE QUESTION

Long ago "they" started to IMITATE NESTOR'S PHOTOGRAPHY. Every now and then "they" IMITATE NESTOR'S STORIES. A few "wise ones" reach out for and use the REAL THING itself without the slightest change; while some, more up-to-date than the rest, "BORROW" NESTOR'S TITLES. Last, but not least, come NESTOR'S ADVERTISEMENTS, whose tiny circlet of IMITATORS is GRADUALLY EXPANDING.

THE ANSWER

If It's Nestor's, It's Good

TOO GOOD to leave alone—so: IMITATE, IMITATE!—and, if you can't IMITATE, APPROPRIATE, APPROPRIATE

"Davy Jones' Domestic Troubles" (Vitagraph).—Apparently Davy's married life is not particularly pleasant. One would gather from this lively and altogether humorous picture that she possessed the characteristics of a Nantippe materially enhanced both by nature and practice. At any rate, the domestic port becoming intolerable because of the numerous storms that constantly arise, Davy departs and is lost for ten years. Meanwhile, Capt. Bragg decides that the excellent looking Annie has pined sufficiently long in widow's weeds and mates up with her. And then the pent up fury of a decade bursts forth and rages around his devoted head until he wishes that he, too, were consorting with the mermaids in ocean's darkest depths. At this juncture Davy reappears, and when he discovers the state of affairs the two arrange a humorous getaway, and probably now are enjoying the comparative calm of ocean tempests, far removed from the continuous exhibition of temper to which they had been subjected. It is useless, almost, to attempt to give a description of this picture. It must be seen to obtain a full comprehension of its fun and the consummate action of all the characters.

"Pals of the Ranch" (Essanay).—A Western story which contains much of human nature, which in one who is weak asserts itself in treachery. The story centers around a girl who is loved by two pals, but when they both propose and she accepts one the other cannot refrain from taking advantage and making his pal appear like the rejected one. Then comes a prospecting journey into the desert by the disappointed suitor and a wedding of the others. But even as murder will out so this treachery haunts the perpetrator so seriously that he tells his new wife and she, burning with indignation, sends him out into the desert to find the wronged man. Then come Indian fights, and ultimately the wronged man is rescued and returns to civilization, but the treacherous pal pays the penalty of his misdeeds with his life. Perhaps if there had not been so many Western pictures with mixups in love affairs this would be a very attractive film, but inasmuch as it is only one in a long train it is not particularly exciting. Whether the field is worked out, or whether producers have grown somewhat careless, the Western pictures have a certain degree of sameness and monotony which is fatal to sustained interest. This is no worse than the bulk of them. There is nothing about it which stamps it as being much better. The acting of the Essanay company is always good and their deportment does not suffer here; but the man who has little to do can't be expected to accomplish really great things in any line. It holds good in acting for motion pictures quite as forcibly as in any other thing.

"The Cheat" (Gaumont).—A card story which does not seem improbable, yet is, perhaps, somewhat unintelligible to a considerable number who will see the film. Card playing, as here depicted, is not very well known in this country outside the large cities. However, the trick by which a young man was despoiled of his honor and virtually thrown out of the building can be appreciated. It was the penalty he paid of not loving a girl who thought she wanted him. Then comes the climax when the old uncle compels the man who performs this dastardly trick to publicly confess his guilt. That is a pretty piece of acting and is a fitting close to the picture.

"The Mystery of Lonely Gulch" (Pathe).—A film by the American company of this house which has merits, yet it can scarcely be said to come up to the quality of the pictures produced by the same house upon other subjects. There is such a strong disposition in these times to run to mining or ranching pictures that the Pathe firm has caught the infection and this is one of the films produced. The acting is good, as the acting in all Pathe films is good, but it is the same threadbare subject, with but the impersonation of an actor to afford a novelty. There is too much of this sort of thing in the present output of the various companies. Unless some novel feature is reproduced the films mean little and the many of them that have been turned out have become in a way commonplace. The situations here are perhaps somewhat novel, for actors and actresses do not as a rule travel in such a country; still, when an actress succeeds in landing what this one terms an easy mark, possibly their presence anywhere can be satisfactorily explained. Owing to the suspicions of the sheriff the chicanery of the couple is exposed, the man is arrested and the woman sent about her business. The ending is quite in keeping with the idea of punishing wickedness which generally obtained, but the methods taken to secure the money of the ranchman are open to criticism. They are rather suggestive in their application and might afford a basis upon which a weak minded person might operate.

"Clothes Make the Man" (Vitagraph).—In this picture the influence of clothes upon the reception a man gets is very graphically set forth, the optimist and pessimist asserting each his own doctrine regarding this important subject. The bet is laid and the man sallies forth, only to discover to his sorrow that the pessimist is correct and that apparel does proclaim the man far more vociferously than he really expected. The fun in the film is contagious and practically continuous. There is plenty of it, but underneath the fun there is something more subtle, something which propounds serious ethical questions. The film unquestionably depicts under the guise of humor a condition which actually exists and which more than one man has learned to his sorrow. Even though this picture will amuse your audience with the illustration of the experiences of the man who is making a demonstration, still there is something that will make them think and wonder why it is so. Admirably acted and clearly photographed the film presents interesting features that will commend it to any audience, even though it purports to be a light comedy.

"Romance in the Rockies" (Lubin).—A snappy drama bearing the animation for which this house is well known and deservedly popular. The scenes about the mines in the mountains are graphic and characteristic. The intrigue, the intervention of the Indian, the rescue of Dick and the capture of the outlaws are realistic scenes. The turning of the outlaws over to the sheriff instead of stringing them up may not be according to the Western idea of justice, but it exerts a vastly better influence upon an audience. It suggests the majesty and power of the law in punishing offenders, a matter of far more importance than illustrating the summary justice meted out by Western men. Then comes the wedding, which closes the entire picture with a delightfully human touch. The whole picture is well worth seeing, and the producers deserve commendation for suggesting the resort to legal means for punishing criminals rather than by a lynching.

"Another's Ghost" (Pathe).—A clever piece, illustrating how an actor makes up to appear like a murdered man and frightens a guilty innkeeper and his wife into confessing their crime. Then they are handed over to the officers to be punished. Some of the views of the itinerant showman's life are interesting and give those unaccustomed to such shows a reasonably accurate impression of what that life really is. Well acted and photographed, the picture will entertain. The subtle suggestion contained in the arrest of the murderer and his wife will exert a beneficial influence.

"Hagenbeck's Menagerie" (Pathe).—A series of views depicting some of the most famous animals in this collection. In most instances the setting is as near like the habitat of the animal as could be devised. Such pictures as this are interesting to everybody alike, whether they have ever seen the exhibit or not. Wild animals afford much interest and the excellent reproduction of this film makes the pictures seem almost lifelike in their fidelity to the original.

"Oh You Skeleton" (Selig).—Probably almost everyone would do exactly as Martha did and seek the deep recesses of the tail timber if one looked round and saw a skeleton occupying the next seat. And if in the exit other skeletons were encountered it is safe to assume that the speed of one's exit would be accelerated. Of course if one was employed in a medical college one might infer that all sorts of uncanny things might happen, and this might exert an influence. But to be startled like that would be the most natural thing in the world. The skeletons pursued Martha wherever she went, and possibly the poor girl is running yet. At least the audience that saw the film is still laughing and probably will whenever they think of it for days to come.

"Ghost of the Oven" (Selig).—It may be all right to appear to bake a man in an oven, but when his ghost actually appears from the oven after the fire has been burning it would naturally create consternation. In this instance the chase that followed the ghost's appearance caused considerable disturbance as it progressed, and the equanimity of a good many people was upset.

"The Banker's Daughter" (Biograph).—A fresh rendering of the means taken by a robber to enter a house by means of a trunk. While this plan has been worked before, this view of it is different and offers some novelty in the means by which the police are notified. The action of the eldest daughter when she sees the hand protrude from the partially opened trunk is natural, and her coolness in devising a plan for summoning the police is commendable. There is some suspense, however, while the police are on the way, but the girls are not harmed and the officers arrive in time to capture all three of the robbers. The father returning at this time helps in the capture of the thieves. Then the little family congratulate each other upon the fact that nothing more serious than a bad shakeup of their nerves occurred.

"Hawkins' Hat" (Lubin).—A warning to women who regularly search their husbands' pockets for money to examine their hats. In this instance the wife not only failed to find the money she believed was there, but she gave away the hat in which a large sum was concealed. Hawkins' feelings can be imagined when he awoke to discover his hat missing. But after some frantic efforts he recovered it and found the roll of bills intact. That was a relief to his shattered nerves, and probably taught the man who had the hat to hereafter examine what he gets as soon as it comes into his possession.

"Archie's Archery' (Lubin).—On the same reel with "Hawkins' Hat" and forming with that a brace of snappy comedies which will please any audience. Archie had never touched a bow, but his first attempt resulted in a bullseye and thereat he became chesty. Well, what followed probably taught Archie a lesson to at least look before he attempted any stunts while practicing. An irate train of individuals were close on his trail, but he managed to escape and possibly now is in a fair way to become a champion in this line. These short comedies, lively and snappy, are appreciated by exhibitors. The audience prefers a short comedy to a long one. There is too much danger of a long one spreading out so thin that it descends to mere drivel. These two are good and together supply a reel well worth including in any show.

"Uncle Jim" (Melies).—A story that is different. Because a girl loved by two men accepts one the other does not get jealous and become the enemy of the couple. Quite the contrary. In an unromantic way he maintains his old friendship and when the husband is killed, and afterwards when the daughter is injured, his is the friendly hand extended to aid the stricken widow. And finally she accepts his proposal and he is made the protector of the widow and child of his lifelong friend. This picture is sane. It represents what most men would do under such circumstances, and while it may not be so romantic and exciting it is without question more nearly human in the way it works out. For this reason it is commended to those who want a picture that presents human nature in its ordinary daily phases.

"Two Boys in Blue" (Selig).—A lively and, in places, humorous story of the experiences of two friends who leave their troubles with a stranded Wild West show and enlist in the army. When the sheriff closes the show the humor ceases and the detachment of which they form a part is ordered to the front where it sees some lively service. The result is the decoration of the two friends for conspicuous bravery. The picture is full of life and there are several humorous situations which will appeal strongly to the audience.

"The Message of the Violin" (Biograph).—More than once have the tones of the violin told over again the tale of love and reunited hearts which had been separated for one reason or another. The love story here is more of the type one meets with in the ordinary workaday world than many that have been reproduced and for that reason it may arouse a stronger feeling of sympathy with the audience. It deals with two typical young people of the East Side who were thrown much together in early life. Then comes the separation, not because a parent violently objects—they don't often do that excepting in highly romantic novels—but because business seems to make it advisable. However, even though the girl is made suddenly wealthy, the young man is given an opportunity to prove what is in him. This touch is particularly modern. That is exactly what the father of almost any girl would do, and as this one follows the course that would generally be adopted in real life, it makes the picture all the more interesting. The denouement, when the rendering of an old melody by the violinist at a reception shatters the prospects of a baron, is the only really romantic situation in the piece; and perhaps that could be true. It is, however, the only point where the drama has departed from the ordinary run of daily life, and it adds a touch which shows how close the run of ordinary living is to the homely life of every day. Something about this drama appeals to the common sense of the average person. It depicts a series of events such as might happen in the life of almost any couple in America. The girl's sudden elevation to wealth has happened over and over again. Most Americans can almost duplicate this among their acquaintances. The young man's success in music. You can see something similar around you daily. These two points seem to emphasize the purely American quality of the drama.

"His Breach of Discipline" (Edison).—A picture which combines in a very attractive way the romance of France and the Great West, a double setting which adds to the attraction and increases the interest with which the picture is seen. It begins in France with a duel between a lieutenant and a captain in which the captain is apparently mortally wounded. The lieutenant flees and goes to California, where he goes into the mining regions and is shortly joined by the woman over whom the two officers quarreled. Eventually the French general learns of the deserter's whereabouts and dispatches three captains to bring him back. When they reach the cabin they are almost induced to tear up their warrant and leave him and his wife to themselves, but he will have none of that and voluntarily accompanies them back to France, where upon the dying confession of the captain he is exonerated and reinstated in his place in the army. The closing scene is particularly happy where he and his wife rejoice over the settlement of the difficulty. The strength of this picture lies in the romantic combination of these two widely separated sections of the world, each individual in its way. And the individuality is perfectly reproduced. The dramatic qualities are unquestionably as good as anything Edison has released recently, while the setting, both in France and America, is entirely characteristic. The photographer has performed his part with discretion and excellence. There is nothing left which might go to make the picture. It is purely romantic, but as a romance is unsurpassed.

"The First Gray Hair" (Gaumont).—A love story representing a girl as giving way in a little affair to a younger woman. That is substantially the whole story, though of course there are numerous changes of scene to add to the interest. Then when she discovers that the young woman has accepted the man she finds the first gray hair in her head. It is difficult to understand just what was intended in this film. It doesn't seem to possess much point and it scarcely has interest beyond the point where the young man is making love to both girls and one wonders where he is going to bring up if he continues at that pace. It seems a pity to spoil good film with such pointless pictures.

"The Amazon" (Gaumont).—Ages ago strong women were called Amazons, but they have passed away, though the name has remained and means all that which might be termed manly in women. The Amazon depicted with a good deal of spirit in this film never rose beyond the rank of servant, but she had all the qualities of size and strength usually ascribed to one carrying that name. Evidently she was not a profitable employee. At least, it is safe to draw that conclusion after seeing the wreck she made of the house on her first day, her excessive strength causing her to overdo everything she undertook. The humorous conception is to be commended. Nothing quite like this has ever been shown in comedy before.

"Jean Goes Foraging" (Vitagraph).—A story of camping which has its humorous side, though perhaps it comes sufficiently near to the truth of camping stories to acquire more than a humorous interest. The intelligence of the dog is attractive. When fish refused to bite and game refused to come within range of the gun, Jean, the collie, goes out and succeeds in securing sufficient to keep the two unfortunate campers alive. Eventually they tire of even Jean's foraging ability and return home, poorer in pocket and flesh and much wiser. This film is meritorious because of the excellent acting of the dog. What happened to the people is the common lot of many campers, but not all have such a dog to assist them out of their difficulties. The scenery is attractive, representing numerous phases of outdoors which would naturally prove a setting for such a picture. The photographer chose his view points with discretion and the printer did his work with care, retaining much of the gradation of tone and the values of the outdoor scenes.

"The Bouquet" (Essanay).—An interesting domestic story, telling how a wife was won back by a messenger boy's mistake. Perhaps more than one of those little misunderstandings which so often mar the lives of married couples might be adjusted if a bouquet was sent now and then. This is such an excellent suggestion and is, withal, so likely to be successful that this film is recommended to those who have had experience in this direction. The situations are admirably worked out and there is a sympathetic appreciation of the requirements of the drama which make it more interesting. Even though it is simple it is strong in its simplicty and there is a subtle undercurrent which seems to go straight to one's heart, whether there is any reason for it or not. Domestic misunderstandings are too common not to have plenty in an audience who maybe have felt something of the depression which characterized the man in this picture.

"Hank and Lank" (Essanay).—Once again these favorites appear in a lively and altogether laughable comedy. From the time when the two altogether delectable individuals fall asleep in the reclining chairs until they leave the unfortunate policeman struggling to free himself from his tangle at the gate there is a laugh in every move. It is, in some ways, a rather rough house comedy, but it must be admitted that there is something about these comedies as acted by these two comedians which makes them rank above most of the comedies of a similar character that have been put out. Hank and Lank are unquestioned favorites and wherever they appear a good humored audience is certain.

"The Motor Fiend" (Pathe).—A comedy produced by the American branch of this house which introduces a novelty that will amuse both classes of people, those who motor and those who do not. The idea is that a motorist has a dream and in that he sees a "joy meter" in operation. Now the "joy meter" is the climax of the film and is merely a register which shows how many mothers-in-law, hens, dogs, babies and other living things the machine kills in its unimpeded passage. There is the substance of the story; but it is told in an altogether delightful way. The ending is as surprising as it is funny. A comedy which will please and at the same time offers something new in the working out of a comedy scheme.

"Bruges, Belgium" (Pathe).—A leisurely trip around this old city, delightful in its semi-calm and offering no end of picturesque opportunities for the tourist who cares for memories of the past. Some of the more important bridges are shown and there are glimpses along its canals which are attractive pictures. Another view is of the market place, reproducing the slow movements which are characteristic of the inhabitants of Bruges. It is one of the most delightful reproductions of city scenes which has come from any studio in months. The serenity of the people and the quiet of all the scenes are alike attractive and charming. Conditions in this city are so different from what they are in ordinary cities that it acquires additional charm. The work is well done and the selection of view points by the operator was admirably made. The picture will linger long in the memory.

"The Strongest Tie" (Kalem).—A Western drama representing a wife about to leave her home to go with a former lover whom she had supposed dead. The husband, too, had agreed to the separation. But, as she is about to leave, a little girl three or four years old toddles into the room. The character of the picture at once changes and what the title means is immediately apparent. It shows clearly that mother love is the strongest tie and that former lovers count for little when set over against the little one. The picture is homely, reproducing a scene which might have occurred in the life of almost anyone, and its emphasis upon the strength of mother love is to be hearily commended. One is disposed to accord it a higher rank than the usual work of this company.

"The Signet Ring" (Urban-Eclipse).—A drama of some power, based upon the presentation of a signet ring by the prince when he betrothed the princess. When she was left in a wood and another woman substituted in her stead they left her the signet ring, and this was afterward a means of identification. While the drama has no particularly sensational scenes in it and the climax is no more startling than the imprisoning of the guilty parties and the marriage of the right girl, there is much interest in it, perhaps, because it reproduces strongly marked representations of that elemental passion, jealousy. With love and jealousy intermingled there is always interest and the stronger they are, or the nearer they come to accomplishing their purpose, the more interesting the drama becomes. The combination here is in about the right proportions, consequently the interest is maintained throughout.

"A Summer Flirtation" (Pathe).—A vacation comedy that needs a knowledge of so-called vacation flirtations to make it plain. The principal feature is where the two young men black each others eyes with the shoe polish and each goes on his way without knowing that he is similarly afflicted. The way one of them comes out of the house when the girl's father assists him is funny, and the climax, when the letter arrives from the girl just as they are about to fight over her, is a fitting ending to a brief Summer romance.

"Hank and Lank" (Essanay).—One may as well prepare for a laugh when these two appear. Before the picture ends it is safe to assume that one or the other will get into trouble, and this is no exception to the general run. Hank gets a liberal tip for caring for a baby, but when Lank gets a similar chance all that is coming to him is a severe lambasting at the hands of the youngsters irate mother. Of course there are extenuating circumstances, and perhaps had the father, with whom the baby was left, returned to his charge in the time he agreed he would have saved the unfortunate Lank a beating. But he lingered long at the wine cup and Lank paid the penalty. These two individuals have come to be favorites with motion picture audiences, and this latest escapade makes them all the more popular.

"The Dishonest Steward" (Urban).—A dramatic picture based upon the dishonesty of a steward, detailing graphically the consequences which flow from a man's treachery and his betrayal of trust. It is neither strikingly good, nor is it particularly bad.

"City of a Hundred Mosques, Broussa, Asia Minor" (Urban).—A record picture of unusual interest since it presents some of the most salient features of a little known city. It is like opening a new world, and the selection of viewpoints from which to make the picture was made with the object of emphasizing the city's most striking feature. Not only is the picture of educational value beyond the ordinary, but it is novel as well. The photographic quality, like that of all of Urban's outdoor pictures, could scarcely be improved.

"Different Trades in Bombay" (Pathe).—A travel picture which introduces the audience to the people of Bombay, what they do and how they do it. It is a faithful reproduction of some of the city's most characteristic scenes. Perfect photography and intelligent selection contribute not a little to the quality of the picture and make it what its producers intended, a faithful reproduction of life as it actually is in that far away land.

"Mirth and Sorrows" (Pathe).—The contrasts of life are emphasized so strongly in this film that ane sees both sides with a graphic force that is disagreeable. To be plunged from the mirth of a comic opera and a carnival of merry-makers into the indescribable solemnity of the presence of death gives one a shock that impresses one strongly. The contrast is great, yet no greater than frequently occurs in daily life. No wonder the merry-making young men withdrew in silence. The unexpected presence of death would effectually stop all forms of merry-making. The emphasis is well managed and seems perfectly natural.

"All on Account of a Lie" (Essanay).—A lively domestic comedy during which the Browns and Smiths get inextricably mixed merely because Smith told his wife one of those stories men sometimes tell when they want to escape the vigilant watchfulness of their wives. The stranding of a balky car in a country village will arouse sympathy in the mind of every man who has been there. The country hotel, with its inevitable best room, inflicting upon its guests the usual array of discomforts and the skeptical wife who does mix things when she sends a telegram to a fake name given by her husband and raises a real, live man. Brown's wife appears on the scene and things get fast and furious for awhile. But everything is smoothed out when Smith bribes the Browns to admit they are impostors. No description can do justice to this very lively picture. Much of life and human nature appears in it and there is more than one hearty laugh before the picture ceases.

"In the Speewald" (Urban-Eclipse).—One of those delightful outdoor pictures which this house knows so well how to produce. It is a succession of scenes in the most picturesque sections of Prussia. There is plenty of good scenery and numerous groups of peasants in their holiday costumes to enliven these scenes. The woodlands, the mountains and the streams are all interesting and serve to make up an extremely satisfactory outdoor picture, depicting scenes in little known territories.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Wrong Trail" (Bison).—It is not wise to make wills in anyone's favor if they know about it, is taught in this film. But not all persons would have the opportunity or the temerity to change sign boards at a cross roads so as to deliberately lead an old man into a desert where he might starve or die of thirst merely to obtain his money. There are some good desert scenes in the picture, with the man groping blindly about and growing weaker every minute. Finally he is rescued by another niece and a young prospector and the inevitable love story breaks out, while the picture ends with the uncle rescued, the cowboys cheering and the girl in the arms of the young prospector.

"The Last of the Savelli" (Cines).—Whoever the gloomy individual is that presides over the producing department of this house he ought to be taken somewhere and cured of his melancholy. He can't seem to get away from films which contain unrequited love, suicide or murder and this is no exception. There is a love story, but it is incontinently cut short by a relentless brother, and when the lovers meet he secretes himself and rushing out kills the man before he has time to defend himself. They might have done all this in the times represented, but it scarcely seems timely now, and the gloom which unconsciously afflicts one after seeing such a picture is difficult to shake off. Something alive, something that has warm blood, not cold blood, is what the audiences want. Mechanically the films of this house are good, with clear photography and reasonably sympathetic acting, but the subjects are enough to give one the blues.

"Their Child" (Thanhouser).—The dramatic qualities of this film are high, but the subject is somewhat depressing since it is based upon a misunderstanding between husband and wife which leads to their separation and much misery follows. The child reunites them. Maybe the picture will teach the lesson that it is better to listen to explanations at first and save all those intervening years of sorrow and suffering. It ought to, at any rate, because that story is plainly wrought out and is as apparent as it is possible to make it.

"A Child's Sacrifice" (Solax).—Here is a film from a new house and surely the public will recognize that for a first release the work is exceptionally well done. Aside from minor blemishes generally inseparable from a first release, there is little opportunity for criticism. The drama is convincing and the acting is quite up to the standard required by the subject. Anything that deals with a child is interesting and the public will call for more. Where the matter is as satisfactorily worked out as this there is no reason why instant popularity should not follow.

"In the Gray of the Dawn" (Reliance).—A new film by a new house, but acted by a few old favorites. Here the human passions are laid bare and the human heart is almost seen pulsating with these emotions. The dramatic power of the picture is intense, at times too intense, perhaps, to be thoroughly appreciated. It is difficult to follow these sustained emotions and correctly interpret them as one proceeds. It is difficult to read aright the impulses which actuate those who are interested in a scene of this type, where there is a clash among the rivals for the favor of the courtesan. Then comes the scene where the woman would like to accept the offer of marriage from the man who has taken her from her former life and made something of her; but it cannot be, and to get him out of the way she sends him for the minister. And as soon as he is gone kills herself. The scene which follows when he returns with the minister cannot be described. The tableau presented is so tense and it causes one to thrill with such strong emotions that it can scarcely be watched as long as it is on the screen. The whole picture is of this same emotional type and can scarcely be comprehended when seen but once. It is a drama which at once places the firm which produced it and its excellent company of players as beyond the ordinary in the production of emotional pictures. The next release will be awaited with great interest because there is always a feeling that the first hardly represents the best the company can do, or the best the mechanical department can do; therefore, the films to come from this house will be awaited with more than the usual degree of interest.

"Breaking Home Ties" (Columbia).—A drama which details the subject with considerable ability and offers some emotional scenes which will be remembered by those who see them. Moreover, there will be a certain degree of personal reminiscence aroused which will allow one te see in the picture more perhaps, than is really there. Few who see it have not broken home ties and the film will have a tendency to make the reminiscences rather more real than many would like to see.

"The Artist's Luck" (Great Northern).—A picture containing much of human interest and offering opportunity for great dramtic interest in places. The work of the various characters is performed with creditable accuracy and the mechanical department has maintained its reputation in preparing the film for release. It will rank with the dramas this firm is now releasing each week.

"Foolshead Between Two Fires" (Itala).—Here is the old friend Foolshead in trouble again. His scrapes are numerous and his difficulties multiply, but it might be said of him that this is the only scrape he ever got into that he didn't get out of in some way. And before the film closes the audience will agree that he gets out of this. The situations are comic and exciting enough to suit the most exacting and there is a broad humor running through it that will keep your audience good natured throughout.

"Saved by a Dog" (Eclair).—Whenever a dog or any other animal is shown in a picture exhibiting extraordinary intelligence it always creates fully as much interest as a person, and this film is no exception. That a dog should have intelligence enough to find the stolen child, even though she was in a rowboat and at some distance from the shore, adds to the attractiveness of the film.

"The Absent Minded Doctor" (Eclair).—An exhibition of absent minded nonsense which serves to amuse for a few moments. Probably one can think of individuals among his own acquaintances that do quite as foolish things as this doctor is represented as doing. Not always does anyone benefit to the extent of a health trip by such absent mindedness, but in this instance the fortunate person began to recover immediately when the check intended for someone else arrived. The absurdity represented is funny and leaves the audience in extremely good humor.

"The Count of Montebello" (Imp).—Another humorous adventure of Gerald and Percy, quite as rich in its way as the others which have preceded it, like "The Widow" and "Fruits and Flowers." They are suddenly transported to considerable financial heights by the receipt of a legacy and they proceed to enjoy it in quite the usual way for a time. But they come to grief through following another heiress, which they had vowed not to do. In the end the laugh is on them, even though they spend their last dollar to catch her in a trap. Back they go to their hall room and eat bologna and dry bread supplied by the friendly slavey. The comedy in this is lively and quite comprehensible, consequently the film will be popular. There is a hearty laugh in its different scenes and the denouement is exciting in its surprise to the two young men.

"Solving the Bond Mystery" (Yankee).—Here is a genuine dime novel detective story, of the sort that makes the blood tingle and causes one to rub one's eyes and wonder if it is true. Nell appears again in this case and after a series of lively and interesting adventures succeeds in bringing the wrongdoer to justice in time to prevent the suicide of the innocent party. Where she goes and what she does only a detective of this type could accomplish. Yet one must own to a development of much excited interest as the film proceeds. Even though some of the episodes are quite impossible they nevertheless are sufficiently attractive to make everyone for the moment forget their impossibility and become a part of the story, watching the work of the girl as closely as though it were actually transpiring in sight. There is many a thrill in it and in the end the criminals are captured and disappear in the hands of the law.

"The Fur Coat" (Imp).—A mixed up story of a fur coat that went astray because a valet hung it out of a window. It was pawned and redeemed and passed through various hands in its passage, finally landing in the hands of the tramp who first pawned it. His second visit to the pawnshop yields him a good meal and what he wants to drink. The actors did their parts well, but, aside from that, the story has little strength.

"The Heart of a Cowboy" (Defender).—A love story which is supposed to have its origin on the plains and represents the cowboy in a favorable light. That the unfortunate girl was gambled away by the Mexican hotel keeper does not seem unusual. They were quite capable of doing such inhuman things. Not all cowboys would do as this one did, send the girl they won home. They were quite likely to do entirely different things. But this girl was different, too, and after she was on her way home, realizing what the man had done for her, the little God of Love gets in his work and she returns to gladden the lonely cowboy's life. That was quite the obvious thing to do. The story contains much of heart interest and develops sentiment enough for several films as it proceeds. The assertion is ventured, however, that the picture is better liked than many which have blood and thunder as their basis, and is a good stride in the steady improvement in the work of this company.

"The Tyrant" (Lux).—A story of slavery, made melodramatic by the young slave discovering that the overseer was robbing his master and proving it in a very sensational manner. For this he gets his freedom. Some of the cruelties of slavery are shown, such as a flogging and the sale of the boy. But the producer was temperate in this respect and did not show nearly as much as he might have done. There is a human touch given to the picture by the discovery of the father in the slave market and his purchase by the master, who gives both father and son their freedom. Happily such pictures are imaginary, at least so far as white men are concerned, and this can be looked upon in the light of a possible occurrence under certain conditions, which have largely disappeared. It will, however, arouse memories of conditions read of in which exactly these conditions, and worse, existed.

"Gibson and Those Boys" (Lux).—A lively comedy which concerns the attempts of some energetic bootblacks to black a gentleman's boots. The comic situations which result from this attempt are laughable. Then the dream which comes afterward, when the boots go trooping around to get cleaned, is a good ending to a film which has life and activity as its principal components.

"The Plot that Failed" (Powers).—The story of a jealous woman who devises an ingenious plan to win the man she loves from a rival. The plan almost works, but by means of a thrilling ride, which has all of the exciting features usually connected with a ride through the wilder portions of the West, and then a few added, he arrives just in time to frustrate the plot and prove that the jealous woman has wronged him. The principal interest centers in that ride. The exciting incidents are numerous and at times it seems impossible that he can succeed in reaching his destination in time. But overcoming all obstacles he reaches the place and accomplishes his purpose. The audience will get more than one thrill from this picture and will enjoy the landscape portion as the flying horse dashes on through the wild country.

"The Lord and the Lady" (Powers).—Here is a mixup that contained more funny complications than are often crowded into one film. A crook finds a lord's letter of introduction and determines to pose as the lord. A maid poses as a lady. The combination of funny results is too rich to lose. All the curious things that could be imagined occur and at the finale there is a scene which leaves the audience in extremely good humor with themselves.

"Young Lord Stanley" (Thanhouser).—Whether this film will have any influence in inducing girls to accept the attentions of their fathers' grooms on the supposition that they may be wealthy lords in disguise remains to be seen. But this girl, at least, was wooed and virtually won by a lord, who, down on his luck, had sought temporary employment as a groom. It is a romantic picture, affording ample opportunity for the imagination to run riot in a number of different directions. The spirit of the girl is best shown when she refuses to see the young Lord Stanley, whom her father wishes her to wed. But when she discovers that the groom to whom she had previously given her heart was Lord Stanley his reception is quite different from what she had originally planned. Much of human nature is disclosed in this film, even though it is, in a way, a travesty upon the way wealthy girls often fall in love with stablemen or others employed about their fathers' places.

"Tweedle Dum Wants to be a Jockey" (Ambrosio).—He wants to do this the same as he has wanted to do other things in the past and with much the same results. What happens is humorously told and the audience is certain to enjoy a good laugh more than once during the film's appearance. The result is the climax and is funniest of all.

"Launching of the First Italian Dreadnaught" (Ambrosio).—A record of an important event in the history of the Italian navy and likely to be remembered in more ways than one. The work is well done, the photography showing plainly what was intended, which is the principal feature of a film of this character. As a record it is deserving of commendation. It commemorates an important historic event which makes it even more commendable.

"A Touching Mystery" (Atlas).—A film with a glamor of East Indian mystery and magic well introduced and cleverly executed. The trick work which makes everything the woman touches disappear is admirably carried out and the disappearance is instantaneous in each case. One thing after another fades away, even to a huge Fifth avenue bus. Then comes the awakening and it is safe to say that after this troubled dream the woman will want no more East Indian jewelry. It would beat with it too much suggestion of the disappearance of everything in sight. Such a dream is sufficient warning for anyone, even a covetous newly rich individual.

"Doings at the Ranch" (Champion).—Here is a hurly burly picture, purporting to depict the mixup that occurred at a certain ranch in the far West. It is a rough house film from beginning to end, whether it is taken at the beginning or anywhere throughout its length. The pseudo wife makes it very amusing for the visitors, and the comedy of the travesty upon society manners and methods will be appreciated. Then comes the departure of the visitors in a huff after the real wife has returned and exposed the deception. But the sister remains and two couples instead of one go to the canyon on a camping party.

"REV. JOHN WRIGHT OF MISSOURI."

A Nestor Feature Film.

"Mr. David Horsley, German Savings Bank Building, Fourth avenue and Fourteenth street, New York." That's an address I wrote in my notebook this afternoon, and I used indelible ink when I wrote it, for it may be months before I have an opportunity to look you up, Mr. Horsley; nevertheless, when I do reach New York I'll not be satisfied until I've had the pleasure of shaking hands with you and saying, "I'm glad I've met you." Now if said Mr. Horsley should chance to read this, he'd stop right about here and more than likely say to himself, "What is that guy trying to get at?" so I'll abbreviate this introduction and get down to business.

The whole sum and substance of what I have to say is this: I've been pleased, made happy, tickled, anything you want to call it, and a Nestor film is responsible for my happiness. Tuesday afternoon I was out "looking 'em over"—one film after another, and I saw so much of the "usual thing" (apologies to Mr. Bedding) that I slouched down in my chair, commenced to nurse a grouch, and would have fallen asleep, but the noise of the other spectators arguing over the "World's Series" kept me awake. Not being able to sleep, I had mentally called up every producer of picture plays in this country, had them all standing in a row, and I was just more than roasting them in regard to the lack of detail, and every other fault in their productions, when the title "Rev. John Wright of Missouri" was flashed on the screen. Yes, I was waiting to get the "Rev. John's" goat, too. That's what we look them over for, to criticize them, and very often we do it reluctantly, for it sort of spoils one's good nature to be forever lambasting the different releases.

But the "Rev. John" still retains his goatskin. I had to come away without it. The very first scene made me straighten right up in my chair and take notice. "Some photography," thinks I, and from that first scene to the very last I kept my eyes glued on that screen. I didn't want to miss one single little move, and when the reel was finished I had a great desire to see it again, and it's very, very seldom I have such a desire. The "Rev. John" release is a corker; for me that means everything nice anybody could possibly say about it—and then some.

In the first place, it's staged right—every move is worked in so smoothly and precise, nothing slighted, nothing overdrawn, but everything exactly correct. Even the idea where the "Rev. John" invites Big Bill out on the grass to give him his beating is fine; barroom fights are vulgar, to say the least, but out in the open, that little fight is a moral lesson in itself. The acting was excellent, a wonderfully well-balanced performance; every member of the cast acted his part extremely well, and nobody was trying to monopolize the spot light.

But the greatest hit of the release is the photography. It's simply wonderful. You could almost hear the "Rev. John" breathe, it looked so natural. And when Big Bill stopped the "Rev. John's" strong right arm with the side of his face, I actually winced. I felt that blow myself.

As I said above, the "Rev. John" release is a corker. You need not try to hide your light under a bushel, Mr. Horsley, for the public, and especially the picture-loving public, will find you out, and if you continue to release subjects like the one I saw, you will have all the exhibitors clamoring for Nestor films. This one release will be the biggest ad. you ever had in the history of your business. I could go on and "just simply rave" about the "Rev. John" until the cows came home, but 'tis useless, it will speak for itself in louder tones than I can. But once more allow me to thank you, Mr. Horsley, for your "Nestor" has given me great pleasure.

THE ORPHEUM, BOSTON.

This house has been numbered as one of Marcus Lowe's enterprises since the first part of September. Louis M. Boas is the local resident manager. The World's New England representative sauntered into the Orpheum at 7.45 and saw a show lasting until 10.45. We really feel compelled to complain at the amount of vaudeville on the bill. It really isn't right to place excellent cinematographs alongside of vaudeville that ranges from mediocre to poor. Why, oh why, Mr. Boas, did you only use first-run films for three weeks, and then change to a commercial service—in order to put on another couple of acts of vaudeville? To get down to business, we saw these pictures: "How She Won Him" and "A Life for a Life," both Vitagraphs and both features in every way; "The Great Secret," an Edison, with some distinctly interesting scenes on board an ocean liner; a split Pathe reel, "The Belgian Army" and "Lucy at Boarding School," the first a fine educational and inspiring picture, the latter mildly amusing. The Biograph's "Oath and the Man," a drama of historic and photographic merit, closed the list of films. Seven or eight acts of vaudeville were inserted between these films. The writer was interested to note that two of these acts drew forth considerable applause. We are going to let you into a secret, and tell you the cause. It's simple—they were both plain, unadulterated singing acts. The same songs were used that might have been heard at any straight moving picture house by an illustrated song singer. This incident brought forth the fact with startling clearness, that music and singing of a good calibre are welcomed at the moving picture theater, and that the ordinary "punk" act is decidedly a "persona non grata."

The Orpheum is an excellent show house in every way. It is large, cool and has many exits, but the writer does not feel that it will wreak havoc on any of the nearby picture theaters, if this false idea of making the vaudeville more important than the picture is kept up. First-run films and less vaudeville will turn the trick much better. The scale of prices has a large variety. For instance, any morning you can get a good seat for 5 cents plus the coupons which are given away. In the evening orchestra seats cost 25 cents, with others at 10 and 15 cents. The five reels given were excellent, but have one deadly fault—that of being featured in at least six houses nearby on their respective release dates. Another point was noticed. The films were run exceedingly slow, taking from twenty-three to twenty-five minutes. This is poor work, as it emphasizes the flicker, and does not do justice to the films. The pictures are projected on a loose sheet, which, of course, prevents a first-class picture from being shown. The theater partially atoned for their sins of too much vaudeville, by closing the show with the Biograph. As usual we noted the subdued exclamations of "Oh, here's a Biograph," when the leader was flashed on the curtain. HENRY.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES.

The Colonial Theater opened Wednesday, October 12, at Lowell, Mass., with James L. Barton in charge. Pictures and vaudeville are offered; admission, 10 cents.

Manager Mahoney, of the Music Hall, Milford, Mass., is doing an exceptionally large volume of business. The house is one of the Gordon Bros.'s string, of which Sam Grant is the general manager.

The Mystic Theater, Mystic, Conn., was destroyed by fire. Manager Charlie Cowan will rebuild immediately.

The Bijou Theater, of Lebanon, N. H., was recently opened by Wilbert Timmins. Motion pictures and illustrated songs are the attractions.

The New Laurence Theater, of New London, Conn., has a new manager in the person of H. A. Chenoweth, who is a well-known and successful picture man.

The Crescent Theater, of Middletown, Mass., has been leased by Manager Engle, who will install a performance of pictures and vaudeville.

The fire that broke out in the Orpheum Theater, Newburyport, Mass., October 16, totalled a loss of practically $15,000. The proprietors, the Newburyport Amusement Company, will rebuild immediately. No one was injured and Treasurer Runnell stated that he will soon be doing business at the old stand, and, incidentally, that the house will be rebuilt to conform to all the latest and best improvements in moving picture theaters.

The Scenic Theater, Revere, Mass., was closed permanently, Sunday, October 9. A scenic railway will be built in that space. Copeland & Greenberg, the owners, will probably build elsewhere on the beach, which is Boston's smaller replica of Coney Island.

Easthampton, Mass., has received Manager Freil's new moving picture house with a splendid patronage. This house has room for 1,200 people, and is of stone construction throughout.

Manager Dean, of the Hartford, Hartford, Conn., was enterprising enough to have a score or so of views of the Columbus Day parade taken especially for his use. He was amply rewarded by the unusually large patronage of those wishing to see this local picture. HENRY.

AMERICAN BOLDNESS AND ENTERPRISE.

Two Hundred Dollars in Cash Prizes to Exhibitors, Operators and Patrons of Moving Picture Shows.

A first prize of $75 and five second prizes of $25 each are offered to exhibitors, operators and patrons of moving picture shows by the American Film Manufacturing Company. All that you have to do to have a chance at this money is to write a letter of not over 200 words, informing us in a general way as to just exactly what you think of the first four releases of "American film" and mail it immediately after having seen the last of the four releases as above to the contest editor.

If you, Mr. Exhibitor, are not interested in the contest to the extent of wanting to try your hand at a letter, do not forget that your operator, some of your friends, and most certainly some of your patrons will be.

You have no doubt oftentimes in viewing a film noticed faults that were very plainly apparent to you but which, nevertheless, had been overlooked by the manufacturing concern. This is your opportunity of not only expressing your individual opinion as to what constitutes a good moving picture in the eyes of yourself or your patrons, but it also extends you personally an opportunity of possibly winning the prize of $75. Take this matter up with your operator likewise. The average operator's salary is such that a prize of $75 or even one of the second prizes of $25 will appeal to him. The fact that you draw his attention to this contest will no doubt be appreciated by him, therefore do not fail to hand him this offer after you have read the terms and conditions.

Take the matter up with some of your friends—that is your particular friends—who visit your theater every time you change your show. Give them an opportunity of sharing in this reward, and the extension of this prize contest to your local patronage will no doubt appeal to you as a pretty good advertising stunt for yourself.

The fact that each and every one of our employees in the office, studio and factory, has had from two to five years' experience with a licensed manufacturer is a virtual guarantee that American film will be superior, in every respect, to any Independent product that is at present on the market. You, therefore cannot make a mistake in exhibiting this film in your theater.

We will supply posters to display in front of your theater, informing your patrons of the contest. The letters that your patrons may write in accordance with this poster will be addressed to the manager of the theater and will then be forwarded to the American Film Manufacturing Company. You will no doubt appreciate the interest that will be awakened in your neighborhood in connection with a contest of this kind.

In addition to the regular stock of posters that we are having especially prepared for this contest, and which we will supply you free of charge, the regular poster for the film will have emblazoned theron in such wise that each and every individual passing you show house cannot help but notice it—the following legend:

Two Hundred Dollars in Cash Prizes to Viewers of this Film.

If you are a live, wide-awake, exhibitor, you will appreciate the worth of this one particular feature in connection with drawing patronage to your theater on the particular dates that you exhibit our first four releases.

The terms of the contest are as follows:

1. That the letter descriptive of the first four releases of the American Film Manufacturing Company, which will be released on the following dates, November 14, 17, 21, 24, contains no more than two hundred words.

2. That the letter be in the hands of the contest editor of the American Film Manufacturing Company, Ashland Block, Chicago, Ill., not later than January 20, 1910.

Dear Sirs:—At foot of second column, page 933, of your October 22 issue, I find a note in regard to this house which is not entirely correct. Talking pictures have never been used in this house. Vaudeville (one good act) was used for eight weeks, June and July only. House runs four reels of pictures and three illustrated songs. Songs are Wheeler's and Scott & Van Alteena's releases of the previous week. A first class orchestra of five pieces (grand piano) plays classical selections for overtures and plays for the pictures not against them. We play to capacity business all the time and S. R. O. evenings and Saturdays. Recently ran the three reels of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," Vitagraph, for three days with special Southern songs and organ in death scene (Eva's). We were turning them away at 1 P. M. on a Saturday afternoon. House capacity is 1,000 and when I took the house to manage it, three months ago, I rearranged lights so that the house is as light as day and no shadows or lights on screen. Run picture 12 by 15 feet, about. Two new Power's machines and first class dissolving stereopticon. Hallberg Economizer and a first class operating room. I believe that a clean cozy house, uniformed and courteous attendants, good songs and pictures well projected, good orchestra and a lighted house are the secrets of the picture business.

It has been my very good fortune to see the inside workings and systems of Keith & Proctor's, Poh's, Loew's, Gorden Bros.', Worcester, and other firms well known in the picture world, as manager and assistant manager. The good class of people who patronize this theater prove conclusively by their constant attendance that pictures and songs can draw on their own merits.

Trusting that you may care to print some or all of this, I beg to remain, one of your constant readers,

ROSCOE W. BUZZELL,
Resident Manager.

THE DAILY CHANGE.

Oswego, N. Y., October 24, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Sirs—In your last week's issue I noticed an article in regard to daily change and I really believe all you say in the matter. We have an opposition house here that runs pictures and vaudeville, running 4 reels a day and changing reels every day, making 24 reels a week. Now I had to come to daily change, but I only run two reels and a song for my program, and as it is a licensed house I have made a kick to my exchange about it, but as I am only a little one they don't seem to care. (It is get business if you can—if you can't, why quit.) But I have no reason to complain much as I do not try to run my shows off in 15 minutes, but give the patrons a good, clean show. Where I kick is in paying a license and getting no protection. I hope the movement you speak about in this week's issue will come to a head and comprise the leaders of both licensed and Independents so that the exhibitor might be able to secure pictures that his patrons want (and which are hard to get now).

I would like very much to be an able writer and express my opinion on the moving picture business, but as I am not I will have to content myself as just a common money getter from the exchange. Yours, etc.,

MILO A. TIFFT.

AS THE EXHIBITOR SEES IT.

Editors Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Gentlemen—Under the heading, "Awakening of the Exhibitor," in a recent issue of your paper, you call attention to we exhibitors' failure to appreciate the likes and dislikes of our patrons, and you congratulate us now on our awakening to this all-important fact. I assure you some of us have always known and do know the make of films that increase the box-office receipts, but I, for one, have been and am now powerless to secure a desirable service that will please the greater percentage of my patrons. Completely at the mercy of the exchanges, I have been and am now receiving a service unknown to me until the arrival of the train at 10.35 A. M., my theater opening at 11 A. M. As business men we should expect business methods, but it seems they have no system of routeing their films until the day before shipment, when they shoot in a film, any old make, regardless of the prayerful entreaties I have handed them by letter, wire and phone to ship certain releases that are certain winners with my patrons. The call of the siren, money, seems to have no effect on their adamant heart, and we receive a film whose title announces to the world a twenty minute period of excruciating pain, the results being receipts sufficient probably to pay the express on the film. Where there is an evil, there should be a remedy. What alternative have I, an exhibitor? Turn Independent and receive a service of stories without plots, and generally unintelligible to the average patron? We have then to choose between an Associated service of occasional attractive films with drawing proclivities, on one hand, or an Independent service undesirable to my class of patrons. It is either to sup from the proffered hand of the trust, however bitter a pill they oftimes administer, or else feed your fill from the bountiful lap of the Independents, and go broke. The exchanges, as you intimate, may not be coining the kopecks of the realm, but if they can deliver the goods as requested by we exhibitors, an increase in our service would not make us growl. As you probably are aware, exchanges are located in the South at rare distances, and the accessible ones are far from numerous; therefore, we can only deal with one exchange satisfactorily. With these facts in view, you can readily realize our predicament in trying to remedy existing conditions. It would seem wise to me for all exchanges to make a flat rate on different run films, which should be rigidly adhered to, and we exhibitors will foot the difference in the lost customers of the exchanges, generally unreliable, by paying an increased rental. Yours truly,

A. W. ROHRER.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I am moved to write at this time on the inconsistency of some moving picture exhibitors. I think it proper at this time to mention for your consideration some of the barriers in the way of the successful future of the moving picture business.

The city in which we are exhibitors (Independent) has a population of about ten thousand. There are three exhibitors, two Associated and one Independent.

One of the Associated houses is running two new reels and one old one in connection with a very inferior vaudeville act; the other Associated house is running five reels with seven or eight subjects, all for five cents.

It has come to my notice that by the time the public has seen five reels and seven or eight subjects they have become so disgusted with moving pictures that they do not wish to see pictures again for a week.

We are getting our share of the city's patronage on three good reels and have no reason to complain, but it does seem that the continuance of a practice of running unlimited reels is sure to work havoc in the moving picture business in the future.

I believe the subject worthy of your consideration and the film exchanges should be apprised of the tactics of such exhibitors.

Thanking you for such time as this editorial might employ, I beg to remain,

Yours in the interest of the future welfare of moving pictures. R. R. S.

"WORDS."

October 20, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—With much interest I read the various articles appearing in your valuable journal weekly. Referring to the late sensation relative to the Essanay name contest for a moving picture theater, I candidly state that I think it is a rank name for any proprietor to decorate the front of his theater with. Gentlemen, I wish to ask you, are you going to change the name of your valuable paper, Moving Picture World, to "Photoplay World?" There is just as much reason for you to do so as there is for me to change the name of my theater to "Photoplay" house.

I compliment the Essanay Company upon their enterprise in offering so liberal a reward for a single name, also extend all due respect to the winner, but the name "Photoplay" for the moving picture houses, which to-day are the foremost amusement places in the world, I must confess looks too much on the miniature order. To cut a long argument short, it seems to me that the name "Photoplay" won't do.

Another word pertaining to the moving picture business which grinds on my nerves is the word "screen." Now, gentlemen, how would it sound if a manager of one of our great dramatic or vaudeville theaters would say: "The screen has just gone up on the first act"? The first thing I think of when I hear the word "screen" is a door or window covering as protection against flies. There are no flies on some of the moving picture exhibitors nor are there any on some of their theaters.

I would like to hear the word "curtain" applied at all times where it belongs. There is the "Mirror Screen," Simpson's Solar Screen," etc. If these men are bright enough to put such a bright curtain on the market they should be bright enough to use the word curtain and not "screen."

Trusting I have not taken up too much of your valuable time, with best wishes for success,

Yours very truly,

"A SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY EXHIBITOR."

THE ALLIANCE MEETING AT CLEVELAND.

A Call to Arms.

Brother Exchange:

Reasons why you should attend the next meeting of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance:

Each and every purchaser of film not now a member is eligible to membership in the Alliance by paying fees and dues, beginning November 1.

You will hear of the dangers now prevailing in other localities which might spread into your territory at any moment.

Every member will be given an opportunity to state his grievances, so that the members in a body can discuss them pro and con and then act accordingly.

No manufacturer will be invited to attend or have any voice in our meeting.

You will see an original 10-page agreement entered into by and between the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance and the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, which has been unreasonably violated by the Sales Company. You will also see other important letters of the Sales Company. You will see the original 10-page agreement between the Associated Independent Film Manufacturers and the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company which was brought about by the Executive Committee of the Alliance. This had been violated by the Sales Company at the time the peace settlement was declared during the fight between the manufacturers. This agreement was entered into and signed and never lived up to. Therefore the Associated Manufacturers declare unless this agreement is lived up to, they will abide by the decision of the Alliance members. These original agreements will be on exhibition.

The Associated Manufacturers have stuck to the Alliance in a straightforward and above board manner.

The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company agreed to protect Alliance members where territories were properly represented with Independent film. This they did not do but sold anybody regardless of consequences, excepting that where a member of the Sales Company was represented, such territory was protected.

Do you expect to run your own exchange in the future? If you do, membership in the Alliance is the only course left to place you in a position to demand your rights.

Many members will be present with information that will startle you, and as chairman, I will see that each member has his say-so.

I hope you will consider the future welfare of your business worth attending this next meeting. We have already received notice from about half of the members that they will attend, so kindly let us know immediately, in order that I can arrange accommodations for you at the Hollenden Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio, on October 28 and 29. If for any reason you cannot come, send me your proxy.

Awaiting your early reply.

BIOGRAPH.

SIMPLE CHARITY.—"And the Greatest of these Is Charity." Charity, that much abused word. How often do we find real charity? Only among those poor souls who can ill afford to dispense it. Most times charity is bestowed with great ostentation and a fanfare of trumpets—we say exactly, but it is only so-called charity. Humility is the father of real charity, whereas, upon most occasions charity is bestowed that the bestower may be glorified. An illustration of this is portrayed in this Biograph subject. In an East Side tenement there lived an old couple. The husband was a cigar maker, but becoming feeble from age, he is discharged. Back to his cheerless home he comes, where his faithful wife tries to buoy up his spirits. The old man realizes however, that he has lived out his usefulness and appreciates the reality of a future of absolute want, short though it may be. The awful aspect quite unnerves him, and he is taken seriously ill. It is indeed a house of sorrow. No money with which to buy food or medicine, the poor couple resort to pawnshops to raise a little money on their household effects, they both being too proud to ask aid from anyone, and there were those in the house who would have been glad to do it. There is a young settlement doctor who administers to the wants of the infirm, but he is kept in ignorance of this case, so the old man goes unattended. A pretty little slavey, who works about the house is the first one to know of the poor couple's sad plight. She in her innocent way has fallen desperately in love with the young doctor, who though meeting her often as he comes and goes, is quite unaware of the interest he has excited. The sincere girl decks herself out in her best dress hoping to fascinate him, but sad to relate, he doesn't notice it. While thus attired she hears the sorrowing of the poor woman, and is moved to a determination to help, but how. She has nothing to spare herself. An idea! And though it hurts her she takes to the pawnshop this one best dress and raises fifty cents on it which she forces the poor woman to take. This is real charity. At length, when her husband is sinking slowly, the poor woman rushes to the City Charity Society. Here we find the red tape of charity. They must make rigid investigation for fear they may give aid to the unworthy. Well, by the time they get through their investigation, the poor man is dead. At this moment the young doctor just hears of the case, and learns through finding the pawn ticket the slavey drops, what a jewel in the rough she is, as contrasted with the other women of the Charity Society. Consequently, the girl has made a stronger though mute appeal to him than did her efforts when togged out in her finery.

THE FUGITIVE.—The strength of a mother's love will never be fully appreciated. What anxiety does she not suffer for her own; what self-sacrifice does she not endure, yet, withal, she is reasonable and considerate to a marvelous extent. The Civil War has just begun and the young men of the Virginia mountains are experiencing that great sting of war—the good-bye to mothers and sweethearts. The scene of our story is Virginia in a locality where the feelings of the people are about evenly divided. John, the Confederate, is taking leave of his mother to join the little regiment of the neighborhood volunteers. Off the band of patriots go to headquarters. Not very far away we see John, the Union soldier, bidding farewell to his mother and sweetheart, on his departure for the front. The two forces happen to be close to each other, and when John, of the Union forces, with comrades goes foraging they are surprised by John, the Confederate, and put to flight. The Union boy becomes separated from his companions and is hotly pursued by the Confederate. Driven to the "last ditch," the Federal turns and fires at the oncoming Confederate, who drops in his tracks. This enables the Union boy to get away, and rushing up to a farmhouse, which is indeed the home of the Confederate, dashes in and seeks protection of the mother of the boy he has slain. Neither of them, however, realized the enormity of this plea. The mother hides the fugitive behind the fireplace board, and as the soldiers later bring on the body of her dear boy, she realizes what the death of the fugitive would mean to his mother, so she is determined to save him, she, of course, not knowing that he was responsible for the death of her son. Later, however, when she learns the facts and the fugitive's identity, she is at first inclined to give him up, but when calm reason takes possession of her, her mother instinct predominates and she thinks of another mother awaiting her son's return, so she enables him to escape by the back way of the house, the Confederate soldiers having departed, they reasoning that the mother would not shield the destroyer of her son's life if he was anywhere about. After the war, when wounds are healed, two mothers are seen, one welcoming back her hero son as one of victory's band, while the other decorates with flowers the coat of the gallant boy who fought and died for the lost cause.

EDISON COMPANY.

HIS BREACH OF DISCIPLINE. The story of a French lieutenant who resents an insult to the beautiful Helene, of whom he is enamored and to whom he is affianced, given by Capt. Miquelin, his superior officer. A challenge and a secret hast in a dark alley result, Lieut. Boin leaving his captain apparently mortally wounded, and rushes to tell his sweetheart what he has done and on her advice flees from France. The next morning we see the detectives busy endeavoring to find the one who has assaulted the Captain. The clues lead them to seek for Lieut. Boin, who has disappeared. Mlle. Helene is questioned in her boudoir, but is so clever in acting an enforced role that she leaves the detectives off the track. Boin has proceeded to America, to the far West, and as musing in California when we see him receive a letter from the beautiful Helene (in answer to one which he had written) agreeing to go to California and become his wife.

Time goes on and Gen. LeFarge, who has command of the division in which Lieut. Boin was an officer, calls to him the trusty captains three: Dunois, Villalon and LePard. News has been received that Boin is in California and that, while Capt. Miquelin has recovered, discipline requires that Boin be apprehended and be brought back to France. This task is assigned by Gen. LeFarge to Dunois and his two comrades. They proceed on their journey, arrive at California and at the home of Boin (a rough log cabin) to which they are brought by the burly sheriff of El Dorado County.

Here they are met—much to their surprise—by none other than the lady they knew as Mlle. Helene, the rage of Paris. As they step into the room Boin reaches for a rifle, but the sheriff is quick with his gun, tells him not to attempt anything of that sort, and the scene proceeds between the men. Boin introduces his wife and all bow graciously to the lady. He then tells them what he did and the cause of the encounter between himself and his captain, and proceeds to give himself up to the sheriff. The chivalrous Western spirit of the rugged officer makes him turn toward the Frenchmen with an air of questioning, and holding the warrant in his hand, he tells them that "if it were he, he would tear this thing up." Capt. Dunois is in a quandary. His sympathies of course are with Boin. He consults the other captains and they agree that the proper thing to do is to leave Boin and his wife where they found them.

Dunois starts to tear up the warrant when Lieut. Boin stops him and refuses to permit the Captain to make such a sacrifice. The young officer and his wife accompany the Captains Three to France, where the final scene of this interesting story is enacted.

Gen. LeFarge receives the Captains and their captive and at first is very stern, but he shows a letter which he has received from Capt. Miquelin, written on his deathbed, requesting that Lieut. Boin be exonerated and stating that it was he and he alone who was to blame for the whole trouble. Boin is reinstated to his position in the army of France, and a pretty ending to the picture and story result.

THE SWISS GUIDE.—Away up in the heart of the Canadian Rockies, at Lake Louise, Laggan, the beauty spot of North America, which is justly celebrated for the magnificence of its scenery, this motion picture plot is laid amidst the snow-capped peaks and eternal glaciers of that region where nature has done her finest work for mankind to feast its eyes upon. The story deals with human love and passion, weakness and infidelity, all centered around a romantic-looking Swiss guide and his pretty wife, who are located at Lake Louise (a Summer resort) for the purpose of guiding tourists over the dangerous passes and deep crevasses of the glaciers which lie surrounded by huge mountains at the foot of this God's Mirror.

One of the guests of the Chalet Hotel is a young and beautiful girl. The rough mountain guide soon falls under the spell of her beauty, and she, all unknowingly, is playing havoc with his heart. He dogs her footsteps constantly, worshipping her from afar with all the mute but intense passion of his nature. His young wife learns of his infatuation but remains silent, like the heroine of one of Richard LeGallienne's short stories. She, in her way, feels that his soul is only sick and that time will bring him back again to his own. But the heart when once filled with love can not long remain silent. At last, while away up in the mountains alone with the girl, the guide can restrain himself no longer and reveals to her his infatuation. Shocked and stunned by his boldness, she awakens him from his dreams by a ringing blow on the cheek and without further word leaves him, to find her dangerous way back over the crevasses alone. While passing over a perilous path she slips and falls, spraining her ankle. She is rendered helpless by the accident, and, unable to attract attention by her cries, is on the point of giving up in despair, but the guide's faithful dog finds her and carries the news of her plight back to the guide's wife.

Here the nobility of the woman is shown as, without a moment's hesitation and forgetting self and all, she follows the dog, finds her helpless rival and carries her safely back to her friends. The only reward she will accept is a pair of gloves the gift of her husband to the girl. It is hardly necessary to say that the goods after his rude awakening were to receive the owners of the woman he [illegible] once again husband and wife are united.

and faithful attention, succeeds in doing so. During his convalescence the young soldier realizes that the pretty nurse has grown very fond of him and also learns from the surgeon that he owes his life to her. Moved both by gratitude and affection he becomes betrothed to the nurse and marries her. When he returns to his old home with his bride he is confronted by his former sweetheart and for the time being almost forgets what he owes to his young wife, indeed, he is about to desert her when there is an occurrence which brings back a flood of memories and he puts aside his old love for good.

SILVER CLOUD'S SACRIFICE. centers around two young Indian girls, sisters, the younger of whom has fallen in love with one white trapper against the wishes of the Chief, her father. It is only through the aid of the older sister that the white man is able to win his India bride but in bringing about this result the older sister loses her life.

BROTHERS.—Peter and Joe Challen are brothers and Mrs. Challen on her death bed gave the older the charge of his brother Joe. Joe was inclined to wildness and when speculation failed to provide him with the necessary funds after the "be nuts luck" was passed he falsified his father's books and used the money thus obtained in an effort to bolster up his depleted margins. But discovery came and it was Pete who, mindful of his vow, assumed his brother's crime and was turned from home. He wandered to the north where he slowly made headway with a promising looking mine. Later Joe joined him and sought to cut Pete out with Marion Boyd, the pretty school teacher who was a true product of the West, a good rider and a splendid shot. For a time Joe worked hard and Pete had hopes of his reform, but Marion refused to marry him and when he discovered that Pete possessed her photograph and became the best patron of the log saloon though not always a welcomed visitor because of his evil temper while in his cups. In one of these fits of drunken rage he vows to kill Pete and starts out to find his brother. A small boy warns Marion of his declaration and Marion hurries after him. Just as he is about to fire Marion shoots and wounds him in the pistol arm. The shock sobers Joe to a realization of his narrow escape from fratricide and two years later Pete and Marion, now married, are delighted to learn of his permanent reformation.

MIKE THE HOUSEMAID.—A woman advertised for a maid who could look after the silver, and looking after silver was Mike's best little stunt. In his eventful career he had looked after enough silver to stock a jewelry store and as he made a very fair looking girl and had some of the best references he could write himself he got the job. The plan was that when the silver was ready to be locked after his pal, Pete, should come and lend a hand. Pete came when Mike knew that all the family would be away, but they had not counted on Officer Clancy. Clancy liked the good things of life and he had taken a fancy to the girl he thought Mike was. So when the family went away Clancy dropped around for a bite and a chat. He got the bite, but not until Mike had hidden Pete in the shower bath curtains. Pete, in trying to get out after all was quiet, turned on the water and was nearly drowned before the water trickled down into the dining room to warn Mike that his side partner was in trouble. Just then the family returned and Clancy found himself without an excuse for being in the house when he should have been on post. He raced upstairs after Mike. Mike's wig came off in Clancy's clutch and that got Mike into trouble. He bolted for the bathroom and there Clancy found the pair of them and proudly chaperoned them downstairs to be praised for his cleverness in arresting the thieves instead of having to explain to the inspector why he was off beat.

Satisfy the Demand for Clearer Films

THE mere novelty of a moving picture has worn off; people now expect clear and steady light on the films, as well as interesting subjects

Wherever a comparison has been made, direct current in the arc has given far better results than alternating current. How to obtain direct current (the best light) from alternating current (the ordinary supply) is therefore a question that interests every thoughtful manager. The solution is the

General Electric Mercury Arc Rectifier

This device rectifies the current with very little loss. It has no moving parts, occupies a floor space of but 18 inches square, and operates without attention.

The improved light provided by the Rectifier will increase patronage.

The minimizing of heat in the booth will please the operator.

The low cost of operation will be of direct benefit to the manager.

BIRTHDAY CIGARS.—Mrs. Damm and her children are seated on the porch when the postman arrives with a letter stating that their wealthy uncle would visit them. Mrs. Damm hustles the children into the house and they all get busy tidying things up for the expected guest. The boy feels the importance of the event but his sister is so lackadaisical she can't enter into the spirit of the occasion.

Mrs. Damm, in addition to numerous other provisions, goes to the cigar store and orders a box of "perfectos" sent home. The tobacconist wraps up the box of "smokes" and lays them beside a box of trick explosive birthday cigars ordered by a previous customer, placing the name and address of each customer on the respective boxes.

After Mrs. Damm leaves the store a meddlesome chap comes into the cigar store, looks at the cards while the proprietor is busy and gets the addresses on the boxes mixed; the consequence is the birthday explosives are sent to Mrs. Damm and her cigars are sent elsewhere.

The anticipated uncle is met, escorted from the train by Mr. Damm and received by the whole Damm family with a hearty welcome. They remove his boots and put a pair of slippers on his feet; take off his coat and insist upon his donning ing-chair and, with much show of hospitality, the a house coat. He is comfortably seated in a rockbox of birthday cigars is brought to Uncle, who takes one, lights it and just settles back for an enjoyable smoke—the cigar explodes with a bang.

He is furious and wants to leave the house at once; he can't stand practical jokes. The family assure him it must have been a mistake and they throw the cigars into the fireplace. Zip! Bing! Bang!!! the whole bunch of "celebrators" go off at once and the concussion knocks the old man out of his chair and upsets the rest of the family.

"Too much is plenty"—the uncle packs up his things and leaves the place, turning a deaf ear to the entreaties of his relatives. He gets away and there is mourning in the Damm home although the children can't help but laugh; neither can we.

GENEROUS CUSTOMERS.—"Business is on the Fritz," nothing to do but complain and everything seems to be going to the "demnition bow-wows." "If things get much worse I'll close up," says the restaurateur to his waiter. "And I'll give up me job," says the waiter, "if I can't get any money out of the place."

What's that? It's a "joy wagon" with a crowd of tourists; they're headed for the restaurant. Immediately the proprietor and the waiter hurriedly get a move on and hustle out to receive the guests who are soon conducted into the dining-room, served, dined and wined with alacrity that is almost magical.

The host and his waiter are all smiles and are astonished as well as pleased at the liberal way in which their customers order everything and anything. Not only do they feed well, but they invite the proprietor and his assistant to partake of their wine; and soon everybody is in a jovial mood.

The proprietor presents the bill to his customers and it is suggested that they blindfold the manager of the restaurant and the waiter, and the first one of the diners who is caught by them will have to pay the bill. The two men are much pleased with the idea and, after the handkerchiefs are tied over their eyes and while they are groping about the room, the customers all escape and make off in their automobile just as the proprietor and his assistant make a lively dash after the departing guests.

Gloom surrounds the refectory, and while the men of victuals are kicking themselves and denouncing each other, a messenger comes in with a note from the waggish patrons inclosing a check in payment for the dinner and a fifty dollar tip for the waiter.

Joy takes the place of gloom and the two happy men fall in fond and ecstatic embrace in each other's arms.

PATHE FRERES.

MAX HAS TROUBLE WITH HIS EYES. Max's eyes are in a bad state. He has "cut out" his little mannerisms and is solemnly stumbling about his room, and gravely attempting to read men's and brick walls. He is even obliged to resort to a big magnifying glass to read his sweetheart's letters. At a cafe his affliction causes him to kiss a strange lady in place of his own divinity. A fencing master sitting at an adjoining table insists that the matter can only be settled by a duel. What happens at the duel is too funny for words, but when you see the film you will laugh heartily.

NEW STYLE INKWELL. Peter invents a present of a new style inkwell to his master, who upon picking up the article to examine its method of working, receives a jet of ink in his face. Delighted with the success of his trick, Peter again secures the inkstand at a favorable opportunity, and looks for fresh victims. A young man making love to a girl is temporarily distigured to the hilarious amusement of his divinity, and an unsuspecting schoolmate is similarly badly treated, whilst peaceable pedestrians suffer incalculable damage to their clothes and tempers. Peter at last wends his way to school, arrives late, is reprimanded, and brings into play again the terrible inkwell. Master and scholars are alike bespattered from head to foot, and chaos reigns supreme until order is restored by the master gaining the upper hand and bestowing a well merited chastisement on his refractory pupil.

COWBOY JUSTICE.—Three Western bravadoes sitting in the Dewdrop saloon plot to attack the station agent and rob the railroad company of the valuable consignment that they know will be there that day. Sneaking quietly along the rails, they enter the depot and creep into the waiting room and shoot at the agent in the inner room. He, after shooting one of them dead, drops with a wound in his wrist. He sees that discretion is the best policy in the face of the overwhelming force, and pretends to be dead. The two villains blow the lock off the strong-box and take the contents. Making for the main road they stop an automobile at the point of their guns, and mounting, force the driver to take them along. Meantime the agent, though faint from loss of blood, telephones the sheriff, who, together with his deputies, start off. Arriving at the station they receive full particulars from the agent and commence the pursuit. From a handkerchief found on the road, and which they pick up while galloping at full pace, they see that they are on the right track, a fact which is also confirmed when they come across the driver of the auto bound by his machine, the gasoline having given out. A little further on they come to a ranch from which the two desperadoes had stolen horses to continue their flight. Augmented by these aggrieved parties, the sheriff and his band continue the spirited chase across rough country until they gain sufficiently to be able to shoot one of the ruffians from his horse. The remaining thief, thoroughly frightened, takes to the water, where he is easily captured and led back to receive the punishment he so richly deserves.

THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA.—The scenes open with Jesus in the act of performing miracles before leaving Jerusalem with His disciples. He passes through Samaria, where the people mock both Him and His followers, and finally He comes to Jacob's well. Here, wearied with His journey, He seats Himself, while the disciples go into the town to buy food. To the well also comes a Samaritan woman to draw water, and Jesus asks her to moisten His parched lips. The woman at first refuses, protesting that the Samaritans can have no dealings with the Jews, but the words of the Stranger proving to her that she is speaking to the Messiah, she raises her pitcher so that He may drink. She then runs into the city to announce the news, afterwards returning to the well to beg Jesus to accompany her to her own people, whose slower moving feet she has outstripped. Jesus complies, and the Samaritans, whose mockery and incredulity die away on their lips as they perceive the Messiah, acclaim Him joyfully.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S CLEMENCY.—The incidents pictured in this film are founded on fact and relate to William Scott, a young soldier from the State of Vermont. Scott is on guard after a heavy day's march, and being found asleep is placed under arrest. He is tried by courtmartial and sentenced to death. Meantime we see President Lincoln in his study at the White House in deep thought, and seeing a vision of the Civil War and the sorrow caused by it. The vision disappears and he reads a letter from Mrs. Scott pleading for the pardon of her son. Deeply affected he lays the letter down and sees another vision—that of the gray-haired mother and a nameless grave. We next see Scott being marched off to the spot where he is to be shot. All is in readiness for the fatal word of command to be given, when through a cloud of dust a coach dashes up attended by outriders. The President steps out and pardons the prisoner, who falls on his knees and blesses him. The next scene is that of a battle with the Union soldiers retreating. The color-bearer falls, but William Scott rushes up, grasps the flag and rallies the Union troops, but amid the dreadful carnage he is shot. That night the doctors and ambulance are fetching, amid the dead and the wounded who are still alive. Lucy hears Scott. He is dying. A vision of the President appears before him, placing him a wreath of fame. Scott expires in his love, and as the room fades away, he is dead. As a fitting climax we see a picture of President Lincoln taking from a vase and a wreath of immortelles and inscribing their names upon them together and when they are unveiled displaying the Stars and Stripes.

SELIG POLYSCOPE COMPANY.

THE EARLY SETTLERS. Hiram Brown and his family decide to emigrate to the West and cast their lot in the then almost unexplored country known as Minnesota, leaving their improved home on the Ohio River. They started on their long journey in old fashioned covered wagons. Two months later, they reach the Mississippi River, being in the early fall the water was low and easily forded upon their landing. They camp for the night.

Indians not relishing the invasion of the pale face white men under cover of darkness the Indian Village near by give the family warning to move on, but this the sturdy farmer refuses to do and is seen cultivating with his team of oxen. An Indian girl (a spy) under the guise of selling Indian wares, is admitted to the camp, gaining the information she sought, reports quickly to her tribesmen, who resolve upon decisive action at once.

In the meantime Spotted Eagle has formed an attachment for one of Brown's daughters. A plan of complete capture of the family is arranged and carried out with all the cunning and fearlessness that characterized the American Indian of that period. They take their captives to the village where they are tied to the stake. A trapper taking his life in his hands, runs the gauntlet—mounts a running horse and hurls the Indian to the ground (a sensational scene in the extreme).

The young girl who had previously warned the camp of Indian uprising is seen making her way to the military post to report the capture. When the soldiers reach the Brown camp, they find the lone settler that had made good his escape on Indian horse and who guided them to the village where a spectacular rescue of the prisoners is affected and again reunited.

SETTLED OUT OF COURT.—"Jealousy is the spice of life," so they say and yet how very often does it not make life too spicy. At a reception given in the residence of the Van Cleves, in honor of their son Willie, a musical genius, Mrs. Van Cleve surprises her husband in a tete-a-tete with a pretty woman and at once she looks upon this as a serious matter. In order to find solace for her wounded affection, she proceeds to amuse herself with a prepossessing gentleman, much to the chagrin of Mr. Van Cleve.

After the departure of the guests, there is a debate between the parents and each one, too certain of having been wronged, is unwilling to attempt reconciliation. A trip to Reno to secure a divorce is the outcome of the interview.

Willie is left with his grandmother, and having learned the cause of the sudden departure of his parents, he determines to join them at Reno. But where get the money, his grandmother having refused to aid him? Willie takes to playing on the street, whereby he earns enough to at least take him part way to Reno. Off he travels, until his funds are exhausted and then he is put off the train in a Western town. Here he again becomes popular by his fine musical talent and collects enough money to continue his journey.

Hungry and tired, he at last reaches Reno and while playing on the street, attracts the attention of none other than his father, he recognizes the familiar sounds. But not be alone stops to listen. Also the mother comes to the side of her son—meets face to face with her husband. The pleading of the boy "Lets go home," finds its way to the heart of the parents and all are happy at the reunion.

JEAN GOES FORAGING.—A young married couple, desirous of getting next to nature for a few days, outfit themselves with a camping kit and start to rough it in the fields and woods, depending upon their skill in fishing and hunting for their own rations. In the beginning this appears to be quite a lark and lots of fun, but as time goes on and they "get up against it," the fish won't bite, the game is nowhere in sight, and their provisions run out. They are in a bad way for food. Their bones ache and they are pretty nearly all in. Here is where they find their faithful dog, Jean, a friend in need. He starts out foraging and soon returns with a fine rabbit, which they cook and find very relishable. He brings them "eats" from all directions and keeps them well supplied with the necessaries of life. Jean is always on the job, and the way he finds the stuff is a caution. Even with Jean's assistance things get worse and worse, until they give up their exploit in despair and disgust and make their way toward home, which they reach completely used up. They order a supply of groceries and things with which to

COHEN'S GENEROSITY. When Cohen is beset by some lowdies who tell him, there is one with the manliness of a hero and strong arms who comes to his rescue and drives off the assailants. He assists Cohen to arise, helps him on his way and shows him other acts of considerate kindness, and Cohen, grateful to his benefactor, blesses him and asks for his card, so that he can ever remember the youth who came to his aid in his hour of distress. The time passes, as it has a way of doing, bringing changes, and, in the hearts and lives of some, storm and strife. Into the home of Harry Burton, Cohen's champion, enters misfortune; with weary footsteps, poverty-stricken, bleak and desolate is the existence of Harry and his aged mother, who, through the strain and stress, falls ill. The doctor must be had, there are no funds to pay the bill he will tender. Harry takes his watch, decides to pawn it and with the money he will obtain, procure medical aid for his sick mother. Fate's meshes are weird and fanciful and the web the mysterious damsel weaves is a fabric of mystic wonder. The pawnshop into which Harry comes is none other than that of Cohen's, who has ebbed the strong current of the tide of fortune and has come out victor in the strife. Cohen looks at the boy, stares long at him, as though his face stirred some dim memories of the dreary past. He consents to take the watch, names the price, and in writing the name of the boy recognition dawns upon him. Welcoming his savior, he listens to the pathetic story the boy relates and something deep aches at his heart. In his throat there is a gigantic something he cannot swallow. When the recital is over he goes with the boy, purchases delicacies for the stricken mother, and brings sunshine and sunbeam to a home clouded in shadow. The mother becomes well. Cohen procures a position for the boy. All ends well.

"IMP."

KEEPING HIS WORD.—He was only a newsboy, but in his small way deserved as great respect as the highest in the land. He was not merely self-supporting—he took care of his little brother, too, to whom he was father, mother and elder brother, all rolled into one.

Business was not good with him and he had great difficulty in selling his papers, but he persevered and allowed no one to pass him unsolicited. One day—and trade had been particularly dull—he followed a wealthy gentleman to the front of his residence, begging of him to buy a paper. The gentleman told him that he couldn't purchase it, because he had nothing less than a one-dollar bill. The boy assured him he would get him the change for it at once, but the man only shook his head and turned to walk away. Seeing the chance for a sale slipping from his grasp, the lad pleaded earnestly with him, saying, "I'll bring you back your change, Mister, I give you my word I will!" Well, the gentleman gave him the bill, and looking doubtfully after the running lad, awaited his change. But he waited in vain, for the little newsboy did not return. Going into the house, the man told his wife he had been "stung" again.

On his way back with the change, the boy had been run down and cruelly hurt by an automobile, picked up by some of his poor but kind-hearted neighbors and carried to his miserable little garret room. After they laid him on his bed he opened one of his tightly clenched hands, which still contained the change, and calling his little brother to him, he gave him the money and with careful directions bade him return it at once.

The little fellow hastened away on his errand and was soon ushered into the rich man's library by the good-natured footman. The gentleman and his wife were just preparing to leave home to attend a social function, but after receiving the delayed change and learning the pitiful cause of the delay, they altered their plans and telephoning their own physician to take charge of the case, they hastened to the bedside of the injured boy, taking the little brother with them. Arriving with the doctor, he soon advised them that the case was hopeless. After his examination by the physician, the stricken newsboy, raising himself in bed and smiling bravely at the gentleman and his wife whispered weakly: "Mister, I kept my word!" and fell back dead.

The little brother has a fine new home now in the rich man's family.

THE MODEL'S REDEMPTION.—He was a poor but talented artist, struggling for fame in a shabby little studio. Food of any kind had ceased to be a necessity with him and had become a luxury, for out of his meager savings he was able to buy it but rarely.

Below him, in the same building, was another artist, famous and rich. His gorgeous atelier constantly rang with the gay laughter, happy talk and merry tinkle of the wine glasses of his many friends of the Bohemian world in which he shone. And the queen of the rich artist's circle was his beautiful model, a girl of many moods and fancies, a reckless, light-hearted creature of impulse.

One day the poor artist, suffering the pangs of hunger and being at the end of his resources, decided to sell one of his pictures for what it would bring, in order to buy bread. Taking it from the wall, he started out of the building. As he passed the door of his rich neighbor, the beautiful model appeared, followed by a crowd of admirers. Noting the woebegone expression of the poor artist, she stopped him and in a spirit of fun seized him by the arm and dragged him into the studio into the midst of a hilarious crowd of artists and their models. Inspired by the same jesting spirit, she promised the poor artist to pose for him and he retired from the room, filled with wonder and rapture at the prospect.

He made what crude preparations he could to receive her and she, true to her word, made her appearance. While she was posing for him, her employer and some other men friends came up after her and dragged her away with them, she bidding the poor artist a laughing farewell.

But the influence of the poor artist was upon her—she was different from the rest—and she returned again and again, petulantly driving away her friends when they came after her.

At last the painting was finished—a beautiful picture of the Madonna. She could not recognize it as herself—the physical likeness was perfect, but the spiritual element seemed foreign to her nature, and this caused her to see herself as never before and a change came over her.

Then came a day when the artist fainted from hunger at the door of the luxurious atelier and was carried back to his attic, attended by the beautiful model and her friends. A doctor was summoned and his verdict was "starving to death."

Seeking aid from none of her rich friends, the model sold her costly apparel and bought food and wine for the artist. But all too late came assistance. He died and she, forsaking her former friends and admirers, took the veil and became a nun, and kneeling in her cell at her devotions, prayed for him who gave his last atoms of strength to paint.

FATTY BUYS A BATH.—Fatty, as his name implies, is an exceedingly stout individual, but very active at that. He purchases a bath, and arriving at his home, packs himself in his new purchase to see whether it will fit. It does, so tightly that poor Fatty cannot get out again. So he—or rather the bath—wanders away down the street, upsetting many harmless pedestrians. He hires a cab, but cannot enter through the door, and eventually is hoisted on the top and drives away. Naturally enough, Fatty—still in the bath—falls off, while cabby, blissfully unconscious, drives on. Fatty knocks over a lamp-post, one or two people, and then wanders on to a bridge. His antics annoy two men, who throw him in the river. He arrives at the bottom and is finally rescued by a friendly driver.

HER DIARY.—A young lady, the keeper of the diary, is much in love with a man, who, unknown to her, is already betrothed. She writes in her diary that "he loves me, and I love him. Hoping to marry soon." But this happy dream is not to be realized, for shortly after the girl meets her lover walking arm-in-arm with another lady. The shock is too great for her, and she writes, "I have seen him give his arm to another, and I must go away." Six years elapse, and the girl has become a well-known specialist in children's diseases. One day she is called to the house of Mr. J. Tindall, whose little daughter is seriously ill. The girl recognizes the name as that of her old lover, and after some hesitation decides to go on her errand of mercy. She is recognized by the man, but the thought of what has happened prevents any understanding. Returning to her home, she writes in her diary: "I have saved his child, and the mother has been dead four years. It has brought sad memories to my heart." Later the man and his little girl call, and he pleads for forgiveness. The girl hesitates, and then writes: "He has returned, and I shall be the foster-mother of his child." Placing the book down, it is picked up by the little girl, who shows it to her father. He sees in the brief lines that forgiveness has been granted to him, and takes his true love in his arms.

MISTRESS AND MAID.—Nan Willis is a wealthy young heiress who visits a fashionable seaside resort at which she is unknown. She is accompanied only by her maid, Susan, an envious woman, who bears her mistress no great love. Bored by the even tenor of her life, Nan decides to seek adventure by changing places with her maid, and thus escaping the restrictions of conventionality with which she has constantly been surrounded. She makes the acquaintance of a young lifeguard, Jim Holt, and accepts his offer to teach her to swim. A very real affection springs up between the two young people, and Nan is sure that Jim, unlike her other suitors, loves her for herself alone, as he thinks her only a lady's maid.

While visiting an isolated lighthouse, Nan, accompanied only by Sue, is made a prisoner in one of the upper rooms of the structure. The plot is Sue's, who hopes thus to be able to make her escape with Nan's jewels and other valuables. The rascally young keeper of the lighthouse and his miserly old grandmother are made a party to the plot by accepting an offer to share in the spoils.

Through her faithful Newfoundland dog, who braves an angry sea, Nan sends a message to her lifeguard sweetheart, who comes instantly to her aid. After a spirited encounter with the keeper of the light, who is also Nan's jailer, the young people make their escape in Jim's boat. They reach the hotel in time to confront Susan, who cringes with fear when caught redhanded with her mistress' belongings. Nan allows Susan to go unpunished, feeling that the happiness she has found in the proof of Jim's unselfish love more than compensates her for all the hardships she has endured.

THE AMERICAN AND THE QUEEN.—Maude, the beautiful Queen of Rumania, is deposed through the efforts of her wicked cousin, Rupert, who seizes the throne. He tries to make love to Maude, but when she spurns him he has her thrown into prison. Through the efforts of her faithful lady-in-waiting, and a kindly priest, the young Queen escapes.

While on a steamer, her cousin's spy locates her, and decides to give her poison, but his attempt is detected by Jack Walton, a wealthy young American who has seen the Queen and fallen in love with her without knowing anything as to her history.

A number of noblemen urge the Queen to make an effort to regain the throne, and when Jack joins his plea to theirs, she consents. But the Queen is only in her country a few hours when she is arrested during the absence of Jack on a mission.

Jack prepares to save the Queen, but has hit on no definite plan, when Father Paul proposes a scheme. The Queen's prison is on the ground floor; it is possible for her to stretch her hand through the bars. And Jack marries the woman he loves, although a stone wall is between them. The priest, with the bridegroom, is outside, and the careless guards do not see them.

Rupert then sends for his cousin again, and for the second time offers to marry her. But she spurns him. Then he orders her execution. The sentence is about to be carried out when Jack arrives with a squad of United States troops from a troop ship in the harbor. The Queen is entitled of an American. And she gets it. Rupert loses his life in the ensuing combat.

SPIRIT OF THE WEST.—A half-breed horse trader while visiting an Indian camp falls in love the daughter of the chief. The girl induces her father to barter with the half-breed for one of his best horses which she wishes for her own. The half-breed observes affectionate glances directed to a swarthy member of the tribe on the part of the girl and realizes there is little chance of winning her except by force. He lays his plans accordingly and prepares to put them into execution. While out riding one day with her Indian favorite, they become separated for a few moments and the ever-watchful half-breed seizes the opportunity he has been waiting for to carry off the girl. Riding along at breack-neck speed, he snatches her from the back of her horse and gallops for the hills. They ride all night, reaching the foothills at day-creek, where the girl is left securely bound, while the half-breed rides a mile away for food. She manages to cut her bonds with a knife, which the half-breed failed to discover on her person, by manipulating her hands so as to bring the leather thongs against its sharp edge. Making her way from the vicinity she comes upon an emigrant train, where she tells her story and is given food and water. The half-breed returns and finds his prey has escaped. Following her trail, he soon learns of her whereabouts, and realizing a bold stand is necessary, rides up to the leader and demands the girl. The half-breed is warned to be on his way. Thirsting for vengeance, he gallops off to the Indian's camp and tells the old chief that his daughter has been made prisoner by a band of emigrant horse thieves and offers to lend them where she is. Mounting their horses, the Indians go in pursuit and overtake the emigrants. They come upon them in camp and attack them. Meanwhile, the girl leaves her protectors in company with one of the party who is sent to guard her to the camp in safety. From the hills in the distance she sees the Indians firing on the emigrants and determines to return to aid them if possible. She arrives just in time to present a wholesale slaughter of the emigrants and tells the old chief the story of her abduction and rescue. The girl's swarthy Indian sweetheart overhears the narrative and slips away in search of the half-breed, who has taken alarm and fled. They meet on the summit of a high cliff and a battle for life ensues. Inch by inch they reach the cliff's edge, each trying vainly to hurl the other into the gorge below. A knife-thrust momentarily weakens the half-breed and he falls, but clutching wildly at his adversary, he succeeds in pulling him over as he falls and they both plunge to seeming destruction. The Indian, however, is saved by a projecting ledge half-way down the cliff, and is later rescued by his tribe, who lower a rope and raise him to safety. The Indians show their appreciation to the emigrants by taking them into camp and replacing, as much as possible, their burned and damaged possessions.

THE RANCHMAN AND THE MISER.—Horatio Wright, railroad magnate and banker, accompanied by his wife and daughter Olive, is traveling in the West. Incidentally the charm of the open country appeals to the girl. With her brother as companion she goes out strolling on the rocks one fine morning. The nature of the ground being very uneven, she twists her ankle and at the same time drops her pocketbook. Happening along at the instant, Peter Print, an old miser in the locality, picks up the purse, and, unnoticed by the girl, makes off with it. Unfortunately for him, however, his parsimonious nature is rudely jolted by the timely interruption of Fred Mann, son of a neighboring ranchman, who, having been lounging in the vicinity, is a witness to the occurrence, and now prevents the pilfering of the purse and restores it to the young lady.

This act wins the gratitude of the Wrights, and being a young fellow of rather prepossessing appearance, they invite him to call at the hotel where they are stopping. He becomes a constant visitor and eventually proposes to the girl and is accepted. Being of poor parentage, however, he deplores the fact to his parents that he hasn't enough money to even buy the girl a ring. The ranchman, his father, in sympathy with his son, resorts to the old miser, to whom he gives a note for a loan of money. The note becomes due and the ranchman cannot meet it, and being pressed by the miser, he becomes desperate. While visiting the Wrights he is attracted by a diamond brooch lying on the table. He is ordinarily an honest man, but the hand of temptation presenting an easy exit from his difficulties, he snatches it up and redeems his note with the old money lender. Subsequently the jewel is missed and Fred is accused of the theft. The welfare of the boy being uppermost in his mind, this object, which has led him to wrongdoing, now decides him to vindicate his son at his own cost. In the interim the miser has become convinced that the jewel is bogus, and working himself into a frenzied fit, goes in search of the ranchman. He finds him in the banker's apartments, where he is about to confess the theft. Clutching the diamond, the old man with distorted features is about to rush at the ranchman when he falls dead of heart failure, and with the recovery of the jewel the guilt settles upon the dead man. The banker, having recovered the jewel, will hear no more about it and apologizes to Fred for the grievous mistake, thereby saving the ranchman's honor and to the son his sweetheart.

THE KING OF BEGGARS.—James Ravencroft was a well-to-do broker whose name in financial circles was one to conjure with during the palmy days of his career; he becomes gradually reduced to poverty, but manages to keep his financial condition a secret to his family. He conceives the idea of forming a "Beggar Trust" as a means of revenue. From this time on Ravencroft leads a dual life. At home he is the same lovable husband and kind father. In the underground rendezvous of the beggars he is the scheming, crafty king of petty sharpers and fakirs. His kindness towards a homeless waif, one of the beggars, wins for him her friendship and his life is saved when the band becomes mutinous and decides to elect another king. Ravencroft amasses a fortune through his system of employing beggars and escaping secretly when the police raid the beggars' haunt, he returns to his room with the girl, through a secret panel, secures his hidden hoard from a cleverly concealed safe in the fireplace and hurries home to his family, the beggar crew being hustled off to police headquarters meanwhile. At the Ravencroft home the girl is adopted and everyone seems happy, except the master of the house, who, in his escapades with the beggars, contracts a severe cold which develops into consumption. Day by day his ailment grows worse. Two of the beggar crew escape from the police and discover a connection between their former king and the broker, Ravencroft. They call at his home and demand money. Ravencroft orders them from the house, whereupon they notify the police that the King of Beggars is none other than the broker. Ravencroft's weakened condition is no match for the shock of arrest, and he drops dead when a detective arrives at his home.

THE GIRL FROM THE EAST.—It was useless—Helen Bright could not and would not marry Clarence Richman, so, leaving a note for her father, the girl boarded a train for the West, meaning to remain at her uncle's ranch until Col. Wood B. Bright had agreed to pester her no further in regard to that detested fop. Arriving at the little Western station, Helen looked around for a conveyance; none was to be had, and it looked very much as if the young woman would be forced to walk, when her uncle's neighbor, young Bowin Good, mounted her upon his horse, and as he walked beside her extolling the many beauties of the West, Miss Bright once more congratulated herself upon her wisdom. This was indeed a glorious section of the country. So the weeks slipped past, and Helen's opinion of the West, enhanced by the constant companionship of Bowin, steadily increased. One morning, however, her complacency received a rude shock—Uncle Bill had a telegram from her father in which the old gentleman declared he and Clarence expected to arrive the following day and to have a minister ready. In despair, the young people carried their troubles to Actor Fairly Wise, who was spending his vacation with Bowin. When Helen declared that Uncle Bill had not met his brother for fifteen years and gave a description of the Colonel and his would be son-in-law, the actor fairly beamed upon them with satisfaction. His plans were soon formed—he would meet the two men on the road, and by asking aid for a friend, would induce them to follow him into the woods. Once there, he would be joined by Bowin, and together they would force the newcomers into a deserted shack and compel them to drink enough liquor to muddle their brains. After which they would be made to hand over their clothes and dress in a couple of convict suits prepared for the occasion. Then, with the aid of the actor's make-up, they would quickly transform themselves into the Colonel and the fop, respectively, and hasten back to the carriage, command the driver to take them to Sheriff Ketchem's, whom they would put upon the track of the two "escaped convicts" to gain time, then dash up to the ranch. Here Helen and her supposed Clarence would be quickly joined in holy bonds of matrimony with the consent and blessing of Uncle Bill, at least. On the following day the actor proved himself to be an artist indeed, for so remarkable was his make-up and so excellently did he play his part that for a moment even the Colonel's daughter was deceived. The surprise of the day, however, came when the sheriff and his men brought in the now merry Colonel, for instead of venting his displeasure upon Helen as she had expected, she was given his blessing and actually complimented upon her independence and spirit.

THE RESURRECTION OF LAZARUS.—Lazarus and his sisters, Martha and Mary, are dearly beloved of Jesus, and the first scene shows Jesus in the home of His friends where He is being entertained in their quaint, homelike fashion. Jesus departs on a long journey, and during His absence Lazarus is taken seriously ill, and despite the great efforts which are made to save him he finally breathes his last, to the great grief and despair of his sisters. After the customary formalities, the body is borne forth to the tomb, followed by the weeping sisters, and other mourners. The two sisters are doubly grieved as they feel that if their dear Master, Jesus of Nazareth, were there He could relieve them. As Mary is mourning alone and most dejectedly, suddenly there appears before her a vision of her Lord Jesus, and He tells her in His calm, comforting voice, to be of good cheer, for He is able to put an end to her sorrows, and is willing to help her. A few days later Jesus returns to Bethany, and the home of the bereaved sisters, and as He approaches the house He meets Mary, still weeping in her grief for her dear brother. She tells the sad tale to the Master and

His heart is filled with compassion; He bids her to put an end to her sorrows, and begs her to accompany Him, together with Martha, to the tomb of their brother. At first she and her friends demur, saying: "Alas, it is too late—three days has he already lain in the grave." But the Master does not heed their protestations; He approaches the tomb, and after a prayer to His Father in Heaven, He commands the young man to come forth. At the sound of His voice, Lazarus arises, and arrayed in the glistening white apparel of the grave, approaches the Master, and with an exclamation of joy and wonder, falls upon his knees at Jesus' feet. The wondrous miracle is accomplished, and the vast multitude which has gathered around join in a shout of praise and glory to the Messiah.

RELIGIOUS FETES AT TIBET.—The Eclair Company has the honor and the great pleasure to present to their patrons the very first views which have ever been taken within the most sacred Temple of the Lamas. Marvelous to behold are the imposing decorations of the ancient edifice, famous for its bronze dragons and other awful statuary, and while the spell of mysticism is yet upon us, a vast procession of priests of the seminary, on the way to prayer, comes into view, preceded by a company of musicians playing ivory instruments of such proportions that it requires several men to bear each piece. Then follow the Chinese officers, magnificent in their weird but sumptuous costumes, and last comes the great crowd of followers of the Faith, to join with the mighty in presenting sacrifice and homage to the great god, Dalai-Lama.

CINES.

A WOODEN SWORD.—Slender pay and an eternal thirst force old Sergeant Arnold to forget the fact that his weapons are not his own, but the King's. Cool, frothing beer cannot be had for the love of it, and in order to replenish his quite exhausted purse, the worthy Sergeant pawns his trusty blade! Frederick of Prussia, under the disguise of a private of his own guard, witnesses the risky transaction of the Sergeant. He immediately orders a review of his guard regiment, and when in front of Sergeant Arnold, orders him to produce his sword for inspection. The next moment the blade is snapped in two by Frederick, who knows that the steel has been changed for a simple wooden slat. This means for old Arnold court-martial, and the execution platform, and the brave old fellow is quite willing to meet his fate like a man. At the crucial moment, however, the King notices on the breast of Arnold the Medal of the Brave, and consents to forget the sin and remember only the courage of his faithful old grenadier.

A FATEFUL GIFT.—Tom Harding, after a long siege of enforced idleness and with his family in want, meets Jack Willing, a wealthy Westerner, who, very lavish with his money, hands over to Tom a crisp one hundred dollar bill for a small favor received.

What can a poor man, a man on the brink of starvation, do with so much money? Tom is completely flabbergasted for the moment, but he soon recovers his scattered wits and starts to get the bill changed. He tries various places in vain and is finally driven to a saloon, where he is given change for five dollars instead of the hundred. Tom loudly demands the other ninety-five dollars; but to no avail. To cap the climax, he is handed over to the police and a charge of robbery made against him. As appearances are against him, Tom is tried, found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment.

Some time later, Tom's little girl is accidentally struck by Jack Willing's automobile and is seriously hurt. As the child's life is despaired of, friends obtain a permit for the father to visit his home accompanied by two sheriffs. On meeting Jack Willing, the distracted man accuses him of being the cause of all his troubles. Jack explains the situation, gains Tom's freedom and more than makes up for the sufferings he has unwittingly brought upon poor Tom and his family.

POWERS PICTURE PLAYS.

ADVENTURE OF A MILLIONAIRE.—Richard Stanley, a young millionaire seeking a new experience, dresses himself up as a tramp to go slumming in earnest. He rescues Arthur Harvey, a society swell, from two drunken sailors who were assaulting him. Harvey takes Stanley to his home. He introduces the supposed "bum" as young Stanley, the missing millionaire, to Ethel Lane, a beautiful young girl, who had rejected Harvey's proposal of marriage. Stanley enters into the game, and he and the girl fall in love with each other. At a dinner party Mr. Lane announces the engagement of his daughter to Stanley. A letter comes from Harvey, stating that Stanley is really a tramp whom he picked up in the street, but Harvey's nasty scheme is exploded, and he is dumbfounded when the young man proves that he is really Stanley, the millionaire.

THE SHERIFF AND "MISS JONES."—Harold Vance is in love with Mary Noyes, at whose Western ranch home he is a visitor. Jim Drake, an admirer of the girl, attacks Harold, and in the struggle shoots himself with his own pistol and then tells the sheriff that Harold shot him. Mary conceives the idea of dressing Harold in her aunt's clothes and wig to enable him to escape. The sheriff enters and is introduced to Harold as "Miss Jones." The sheriff is smitten. He courteously offers to drive "Miss Jones" to the station and a ludicrous situation arises when he proposes marriage to the supposed lady. Harold gets safely away. Drake recovers and admits the truth about the shooting. Then Harold returns, and the laugh is on the sheriff when he realizes that he made love to a man.

MENTAL SCIENCE.—Percy Pray is in love with Laura May, but her rich father says him nay. Percy finds a book on mental science on the secret of wealth, love, etc., by the exercise of will-power. Percy exercises his will-power on the girl, who rejects a rich suitor in his favor. Then he makes the old man take him into his business. Percy employs mental science to help their pretty housemaid to win back her lover. The girl expresses her gratitude by hugging him. Enter wifey, who sees this. Explosion. Back to ma for wifey. Wifey is just telling her mother that she will never, never see Percy again. Biff! Percy's mental science has been at work, and wifey runs back home to Percy's loving embrace.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT TO THE EXHIBITOR

An unprecedented opportunity is offered to exhibitors and individual owners of good exchanges to participate in the advantages and in the profits of a large film-producing company organized on a co-operative basis.

This Company will enter the field under most unusually favorable conditions.

In regard to patent privileges and the influence of any trade organizations that may exist, its stands inviolate and supreme.

It is backed by men of world-wide commercial standing.

It will be managed by men of long experience in the film business—men of clean record and business integrity.

Tentative agreements have already been made with some of the best literary and histrionic talent that the country affords.

The best of skilled labor is ready to begin operations.

Besides profit-making and profit-sharing it will be the aim of this organization to up-build a business which seems to be in danger of disintegration through purely selfish interests. Here is the opportunity at last that many exhibitors have wished for—the opportunity to have a voice and an interest in a vital part of the business—the producing end.

The preferred stock of this Company is open for subscription to exhibitors and exchange proprietors. Full particulars may be obtained by interested parties addressing is a matter of experience. Every user says it is better than any other carbon on the market. Notice the better. If the BIO was only "just as good" we would take it off the market to-morrow.

For forty years the name of KIEWERT has never been identified with any article that could not win "hands down" on its merits alone.

We never worry for fear our customers may try the other fellows' goods. We encourage them to do so. We know the result and welcome the test. Make it now for yourself. Pin your check for $1.50 to this ad. and mail to our nearest office for a sample 50 prepaid.

The Improved BIO Arc Screen is another BIO product that you will want when you see it.

It shows an accurate full-size reproduction of the Arc., outside of the lamp-house. It will enable any operator to get better results and get them easier.

We can't tell you all about it here. Just send along a dollar and get one on suspicion. Your money back if you want it.

The Alba Flame Arc Lamp

combines the most attractive of signs with plenty of "cheer-up" illumination that will draw the crowds from blocks in each direction.

You could'nt get half the advertising for ten times the money spent in incandescent electric signs and decorations.

We have a deferred payment plan for those who wish it.

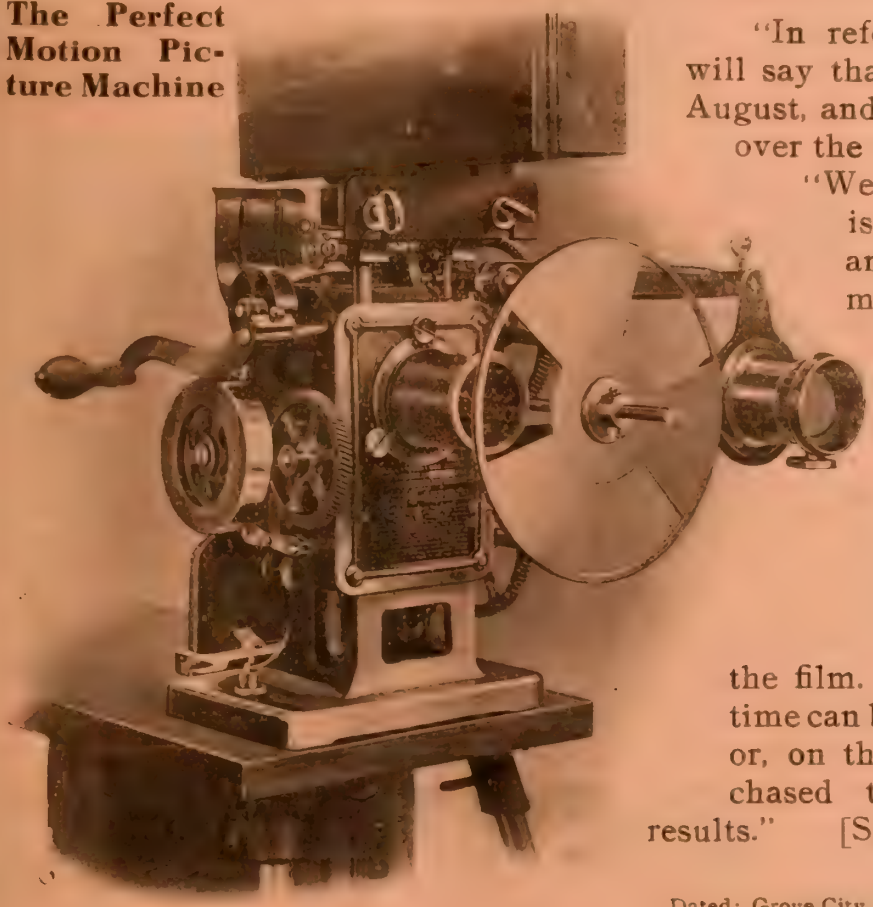
Power's Cameragraph No. 6

The Perfect Motion Picture Machine



"In reference to the No. 6 Machine, will say that I have been using one since August, and find it a decided improvement over the various old-type machines.

"We are able to get a picture which is remarkable for its steadiness and absence of flicker, and the machine runs very quietly. I also find that I am able to project a picture at a much slower rate of speed than with the two-blade shutter type machines and still get a flickerless picture. I am, therefore, able to show a picture at a speed in keeping with the motions portrayed in the film. Three to five minutes more time can be gotten out of a reel if wanted, or, on the other hand, the film can be chased through with equally good results." [Signed] JOHN GUTHRIE, Mgr. Empire Theatre.

"LOOP!"

The Chicago Correspondent of a Trade Paper Says:

"Chicago, October 24, 1910.—Ever heard of Madison street, or, rather the Madison street known to the moving picture interests of this burg? Well, I'll do a little explaining. The part of Madison street I speak of is but one block between Dearborn and Clark streets, and in this short block are four five-cent theaters. Hence its name, 'Nickel Show Row.' Well, to get down to my story, Madison street has held the center of the stage during the past week. Up to this time the four theaters were all showing trust films and every day at least two of them were showing the same picture, thus crabbing their own game, not to say it kept them from doing business. Far be it from such, as Madison street is a natural spot for a picture show and all four places are crowded from ten a. m. to ten p. m., but it is one thing to have a large audience and another thing to satisfy this same large audience with what they had just seen next door or across the street, so for a long time the wise ones said 'some one ought to go Independent,' and when Harry Fitzpatrick was running the Casino Theater (which is owned either by Charley Weighman, of lunch room fame, Murphy of the Cub ball team, or Chas. Taft, brother to the President, still is a mystery). He and Weighman spent weeks exceeding the speed limit in a forty horsepower buzz cart from one Independent picture house to another gathering data and looking at Independent stuff, but they got cold feet and stuck to the Licensed Film and it got to look as though the poor Independent picture was never going to have a chance downtown, when suddenly and without warning, the Boston, controlled by Ferris, another restaurant man, contracted with The Standard Film Service for first run Independent films last Monday.

"I made it a point to watch this house and its patrons to see what sort of a reception the change would be given, and, believe me, as I sat through a show last Tuesday I never saw an audience enjoy a picture as they did the Thanhouser 'Oh, What a Knight,' and a couple of other reels."

IS a "Film d'Art"—and a "Masterpiece"—and a "Classic"—and WHATEVER ELSE YOU CALL A CORKING GOOD PICTURE. Of course, much credit must be given to the dead-and-gone writer of the story; still, good stories don't always make good pictures. HERE A PERFECT TALE MAKES A PERFECT SUBJECT. While perfection is its own best advertisement, you may impress that perfection a bit better on your audience with a lecture on the story. If you haven't a lecturer, pass the synopsis to your singer and see if it doesn't enable him to "talk" intelligently on this tremendously popular tale.

The City of Her Dreams

is a city picture, a town picture, a village picture, a WILDERNESS picture—a picture that'll attract attention wherever a projection machine can be put up. Why? Because it portrays something we all have in common and portrays it well. WHO has not dreamt? WHO is not interested in dreams? The picture tells of the dream as no other descriptive agency ever, ever could; and the cowboy of the plains and the clerk of the city will sit enthralled throughout the telling. No. 161. As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

USE THE "PERFECTO"

The New Calcium Light Outfit

The Initial Cost is Less than that of any other and it can be Maintained for Less.

$25.00
Complete with Burner

At last a calcium gas making outfit that produces the maximum light at the minimum expense can be had. The "Perfecto" solves the problem. In less space you get more gas pressure than in any other calcium light, hence a more powerful light, and at less expense because of its generating process. It is the simplest of calcium lights and naturally the best; is non explosive, never gets out of order, and complete weighs only 15 pounds. There are no frills about the "Perfecto." It's just a plain calcium gas making outfit that produces the powerful light that you must have, and above all at the least possible cost. Every exchange and dealer in lighting outfits should handle this light, and every exhibitor who is forced to use a calcium light should use this one. It's the cheapest in every way, and the best. Write for more particulars, or we'll ship C. O. D. upon receipt of deposit. Price $25.00 complete with burner.

NOTICE.

The new Western offices of the Moving Picture World, Rooms 307-309, Post building, 160 Washington street, Chicago, are now ready to receive World readers visiting Chicago. Mr. John M. Bradlet, Western representative of the World, will extend to every one a cordial welcome. They will find a complete file of manufacturers' catalogues and a bureau of information on films, theater construction, materials and supplies. They will also find desks and stationery for their correspondence, the services of a lady stenographer and a polite messenger boy to act as their guide or go their errands. We invite every exhibitor or person interested in motion pictures to make our Western office their headquarters when visiting Chicago.

Decorating the Picture Theatre.

People who build moving picture theaters in New York City do not, as a general rule, rise to the level of their opportunities. We say nothing of those who concentrate their efforts on store shows, or the adaptation of existing theaters. We mean especially built houses for the moving picture. Let us leave the whole question of external architecture out of consideration, though this is of some importance. Take the case of the New Theater, the subsidized theater de luxe of New York City, if not of the world. Here the talking drama finds a splendid home, the exterior of which is a fine piece of architecture, well calculated to dignify the talking drama. We have nothing like this in moving picturedom and probably it will be some time before New York enterprise will do the right thing in this regard.

We are writing chiefly of the decorative treatment of moving picture theater interiors. Some recently built places in this city while pleasing us by their attempts at decorative tastefulness seem to us to merely indicate possibilities rather than to show performances. We have touched upon this subject before now in the pages of the WORLD. It is one to which we feel compelled to revert in the interests of moving picture exhibitions. They cannot pay too much attention to this vital principle of the business; that, having got the people into their theater, they must do all that is possible to promote their comfort and please their eyes by suitable decorations, conveniences, etc., in order that they may be attracted again and again to their houses.

Generally speaking, the moving picture theater de luxe finds, according to our information, its best expression abroad. In London, Paris, Rome and other large cities of Europe, the moving picture theater in its most up-to-date form is a veritable palace of comfort. The theater itself is well built and decorated. Then the creature comforts of the visitors are looked after. You have retiring rooms, writing rooms, lounges, flowers, telephones, smoking rooms, the requirements of ladies are provided for, generally speaking, by the best class of European moving picture theater, you have all the conveniences and comforts of an opera house. Here, in New York City, this condition of things hardly prevails, although in the West, in Boston, in Baltimore and in other cities, we know that improvement is distinctly manifesting itself.

Much generally remains to be done by the moving picture theater owner, exhibitor or builder to uplift his end of matters by giving the public of his best in the way of design, construction, decoration, convenience. In respect of decoration there has recently come into our hands an elaborate book entitled "Bidding for Trade." It is issued by the Robert Graves Company, of New York, and it contains a collection of color plates of designs for interior decorations of churches, Sunday School rooms, lodge rooms, society and public halls, theaters, moving picture parlors, etc., etc. The company manufacture wall papers of all grades for the purpose of interior decoration. We turn with interest to plates 16, 17, 18, 19 in the book. Plate 16 shows the interior of a theater decorated in accordance with designs and details previously given. Here we see the effect of a combination of pressed leather and stencil borders. Greek friezes supply part of the scheme, and according to the colored illustration the tout ensemble of this theatrical decoration is bright, refined and harmonious. Plate 18 is that which deals with the interior of a moving picture parlor, and is, of course, of greater interest to us. Here, by the aid of a plate of the details of the various parts of the decorative scheme, we can study how the effect is made up. There is a curtained opening showing the ceiling which has a symmetrical design. On the walls there are graceful figures of dancing girls and the like. The lower part of the wall also has a suitable design. The color scheme is appropriate and restful and the total effect is that of refinement, delicacy and beauty, calculated to impress a visitor with the idea that the proprietor or manager of the theater is doing his utmost to make his house agreeable to look at.

When we examined the prices of the work which the Robert Graves Company are prepared to put into a moving picture theater, we were struck by the moderate cost of material. For example: A moving picture parlor, 20 x 60 with a ceiling 15 feet, can be decorated at a total cost of $110.95. The specification is given in detail, showing the exact number of pieces required and their cost, so that the owner or manager of a theater knows exactly what he is called upon to pay when ordering his house decorated. The Robert Graves Company have a gigantic factory in Brooklyn, at 929 Third avenue, with retail stores in Brooklyn, New York City, Philadelphia and elsewhere. Their products may be obtained through any wholesale wallpaper house or firm of decorators, who no doubt can show their sample book to exhibitors.

We take pleasure in drawing the attention of our readers to this elegant book. So far as we know the Robert Graves Company is the only firm which expressly lays itself out to supply the interior decoration of moving picture theaters. Their enterprise in this respect deserves the support of all those who, like ourselves, wish to see the moving picture theater converted into the house beautiful. To quote from the book: "Dignity and grace are characteristic of the designs illustrated, which are printed in colors best suited to harmonize with the surroundings usually found in places for which they are intended." The parts illustrated in the book can be adjusted to suit the requirements of any room, regardless of its shape or size. This is the time of the year when the moving picture theater exhibitor finds his business at its lowest ebb. It is essentially a time therefore when he can embrace the opportunity of redecorating his theater for the Fall trade. We consider, therefore, we are doing the exhibitor a service in drawing his attention to the unique opportunity the Robert Graves Company gives him of putting his theater in order with new and inexpensive decorations.

Mr. Edison and the Color Problem.

Last week, before the New York Electrical Society, The American Kinemacolor Company demonstrated kinemacolor, inviting to the demonstration representatives of the New York newspapers, who wrote lengthily, if not very intelligibly, about what they saw. Enough, however, that they were appreciative. It can hardly be expected that your all-around reporter, when invited to a demonstration of the nature of kinemacolor, can grasp off-hand, the underlying principles and theories of a somewhat complex process. Still, our confreres did very well, and kinemacolor has come in for splendid notices in the New York press. We hope these are but the prelude to the general introduction of the process, into the vaudeville or moving picture theaters of the country.

Our purpose on this occasion is not to discuss kinemacolor. We did so very thoroughly last December, when it was introduced to the public of this country at the Madison Square Garden. Our present attitude towards the process is one of sympathetic interest: we want to see it well introduced before the public. There we leave the matter for the time being. Our main interest lies in the association of Thomas Alva Edison's name with this matter. The New York "Times" of Saturday last contained the following paragraph:

"It is understood that the perfection of this process is stealing Mr. Edison's fire. At the time of the private exhibition in his West Orange laboratory recently, of his talking pictures—the combination phonograph and kinetescope which he calls the kenetphone—he spoke of his expectation to produce before long moving pictures in their natural colors."

We have read something like this before and frankly we do not believe that Mr. Edison has any "fire" to lose, because, we do not think that he has advanced one single step towards the solution of the color problem in moving pictures. Time after time within the last year or two, he has been quoted as saying that he expected to produce these pictures, but he had a difficulty in "photographing the red." Our information is that the Edison experimentalists are tinkering with trichromatics over at Orange, and that Mr. Edison and his staff are about as far from the solution of the problem as they are from Sirius. In fact the problem is in no danger of being solved at Orange, N. J.

We wish to say that if Mr. Edison is working on color, either he or his press representatives should be more specific. We do not believe he is, or that if he is, that he is not on the right track. Of course, these reports as to Mr. Edison's association with the problem may be unauthorized. We hope they are, for to anybody who knows anything about the subject, they certainly show him in a somewhat absurd aspect: that of being always going to do something and never doing it.

This color question with regard to moving pictures has not yet been finally solved. The thing will be done in due course. That goes without saying. The Urban-Smith process is a step on the way, a very valuable step, but not the final step. For that matter there is nothing final in this world. But there is such a thing as approximate or practical completeness, and that is the point to be aimed at in respect of this color problem. As was pointed out in these pages recently, a factory process, not a laboratory process is desiderated. The Urban-Smith process is not a factory process in the accepted meaning of the term. Still it gives very beautiful results which we hope to see generally shown in this country ere long. If Mr. Edison has a factory process up his sleeve, the sooner he produces it, the sooner he will add a few extra millions to his bank account. But if our head does not ache, before Mr. Edison produces his process, we shall have a long time to wait.

The Actor—Likewise the Actress.

"I am a great admirer of 'The Moving Picture World,' but would be a still greater admirer if it contained more as regards the actors. I am an actor (moving picture), and know that all criticism and suggestions, made by the 'World,' are greatly appreciated by a great many, and I believe all the actors. Of course, every issue contains valuable information in this respect, but more would be heartily welcomed, I am sure."

The above is a letter that reached us some few weeks ago, and that we have retained for a convenient opportunity to take up the theme which it suggests. The theme was in our minds the other evening at the Laemmle dinner, when, for one of the first times in our experience, we were face to face in social conditions with a body of moving picture actors and actresses. Let us say that we were impressed by the evident good bearing and refinement of these moving picture stage folks. Quite recently a well-known lady writing us in regard to her liking for the picture, used this phrase: "she was so used to the personalities of these picture players, that she felt as though she actually knew them." This, we believe voices a common feeling. The moving picture actor and actress deserve to be better known, and no doubt will be in time. And being better known, they will, of course, come in for newspaper and personal criticism and commendation just as do the actors and actresses of the ordinary stage.

At present the better known moving picture actors and actresses are known to the public at large. The rank and file, however, are not. They are not even known to us by name. The result is that, while we are willing to comply with our correspondent's request, and that is, to say something about the actors and actresses in the pictures, we are unable to do so for obvious reasons. First and foremost the film makers mostly withhold the necessary information. They, unlike their confreres of the ordinary stage, do not supply programs, so that we may identify the actors and actresses and write criticisms about them.

We suggest the step, however, which, if taken will, we think, meet our correspondent's desire and be for the good of the business in that it will emphasize public interest in these moving picture actors and actresses, whose personalities are certainly as interesting as those of the people on the ordinary stage. Let each picture or reel be preceded by the full cast of the characters in the play, with the names of the actors and actresses playing the parts. This being done, the people in a theater will soon get to know these actors' and actresses' names, and so will we. We shall be able to follow their doings on the screen, just as if we were criticising plays in an ordinary theater where programs are provided. Then would be our opportunity to analyze and criticize the acting in these picture plays by singling out various actors and actresses for mention. This is evidently what our correspondent wants, and we think his request a reasonable one.

As we have pointed out before, it is only within the last year or so that the personalities of these picture players have been made known to the public. We are not sure, but we think that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD when it began to write about the "Biograph girl," started the fashion. Now, of course, the veil of anonymity has been gradually turned aside and the public is getting to know these moving picture favorites. We want to know more about them, so that we may keep track week by week of the progress of these clever people in their difficult art. Our correspondent may be assured that we are in entire sympathy with him, and will do our best to oblige him when opportunity presents.

We never grudge an actor or an actress whatever glory, fame or success he or she may achieve. It is hard work at the best of times. Few of them achieve the solid success of the plethoric bank account, and when they die they leave no evidence of their work except newspaper references and more or less agreeable memories. No actors have died rich—or at least very, very few of them. Half a dozen have had statues erected to them. They, in fact, pursue a calling which leaves no permanent visible contribution toward the progress of the world. They devote their lives to entertaining others. The rewards are meagre; and the success, applause, and popular esteem which they receive should certainly not make them the envy of their fellow beings. Yet, what an extraordinary amount of interest attaches to the personalities of these players! What would the illustrated papers do without pictures of star women and gallant heroes of the stage? What indeed? We are so thoroughly in sympathy with the sentiment of our correspondent's letter that by and by we hope to see our own pages liberally adorned with pictures of the players. But much remains to be done in the moving picture field before that stage is reached. The casual moving picture actor and actress have to be sent into obscurity; the trained and finished performer must come to the front. There are too many of the former kind still in the moving picture field, otherwise, our articles under the caption "The Usual Thing" would lose half their interest.

The Call to Arms.

By M. A. NEFF.

I notice an article in your paper of November 5, headed an "Alliance Call to Arms." You stated in this article that you would be willing to voice the ideas of exhibitors and others. I wish to offer the following solution to the problem discussed:

All republican governments derive their power from those whom they govern. All branches of business receive their benefits from those whom they supply. The manufacturers of motion pictures receive their pay from the film exchanges. The film exchanges receive their pay from the exhibitor. The exhibitor depends on the public for patronage. Hence the importance of the prosperity of the exhibitor. If the exhibitor is to prosper and raise the standard of his business, it is absolutely necessary for the exhibitor to organize, and through organization, agitation and education can the exhibitor enjoy his commercial rights and his legislative rights.

Civilization has been the means of eliminating witchcraft and the war dance. It is a vast institution for the elimination of those who will not see when the light is turned on. The Exhibitors' League organization will eliminate the undesirable and protect those who are legitimately engaged in the moving picture business, and bring about a close, friendly understanding of the exhibitor, which cannot help but produce good effects to everybody concerned in the moving picture business. The time is rapidly passing when a few men in the picture business can dictate to many men, and just as soon as the Exhibitors' League is thoroughly organized, which will be soon, then their rights will be protected, and they will not have to pay and beg for favors, but pay for them and get them, as all other lines of business are doing.

The Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company have had specially constructed lobby display boards made for the exhibition of their Wild West pictures. For the enterprising exhibitor who anticipates the exhibiton of these special Western pictures, we would advocate his getting in touch with P. P. Craft, of the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill Film Company, 111 East Fourteenth street, and securing one of these display boards for advertising purposes.

The Sentiment of the Picture.—IV.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

The more I consider this subject the more it seems to grow upon me, and the more I am gratified to learn that my readers seem to like what I have to say under this caption. I suppose it is that we are all sentimentalists in the affairs of life: In love and business, in war, in good and bad fortune, in friendship and the like. Come to think of it, as I said in the first of these articles, sentiment plays a very large part in all our minds. One cannot, indeed, conceive of life without sentiment. But this is a very large subject with which I am not competent to deal in its broadcast aspects. It needs the pen of a Charles Lamb, a Goethe, a Lowell, a Hawthorne, to do it justice.

I have always had a sentimental regard for the picture in certain of its aspects, just as I have had a sentimental regard for some of the aspects of stationary photography. For example: I can never look at an Urban picture, or an Urban-Eclipse picture, without being reminded of Charles Urban, with whom, as the reader knows, I have frequently crossed swords. For Urban always was a moving picture man, and I think always will be. He has never sent out a moving picture from which his clever personality is absent. To do Urban justice, he was an enthusiastic picture man ten years ago, when the prospects of the picture business being where it is to-day looked very remote. So it is that I have always had, and always shall have, a sentimental regard for an Urban picture, because an Urban picture in my mind is associated with sincerity in picture making. I disagree with Charles Urban in many things, but he has always been a loyal picture man, and that is why I have some sentimental feeling towards the pictures which bear his name, when, as is the case, Urban himself has really nothing whatever to do with their present production. Curious, isn't it? But then you have photographers who swear by Ross lenses, Dallmeyer lenses, whilst Ross and Dallmeyer have long since gone to glory. It is a matter of sentiment: vague, indefinable, intangible, but there all the same.

When sentiment exists it is a very dangerous thing to tamper with. Sentiment is a valuable asset in life, and very often a valuable asset in business. Take these American moving pictures. Spontaneously and without reference to anything, I conceived a sentimental regard for the Biograph picture. I have not spoken twenty words with anybody connected with the Biograph Company. I have never been in their studio. I do not know their staff, their producers, actors, or anybody associated with the Company, yet mere mention of a Biograph picture seems to awaken in me a desire to see that picture. I always felt I could get into the skin of their subjects, and think as their producers and actors and photographers thought. Contrariwise, the Edison picture seldom had that elusive sentimental interest for me. I always went and saw it, and wrote about it merely as a matter of duty. Kalem, too, came under the same category; Lubin, also, merely a curious interest in their grotesque variety. I cannot explain this, unless it is that I imbibed the sentiment of the public, for it is the fact that the exhibitor and the public feel the same way.

Pathe, I used to hugely admire, when they put out those masterful French subjects, for I love the French sentiment as I love all things French. I have lived the life in Paris and anything French always appeals to me. Sentiment again! So, too, with those charming Essanay comedies that came out of Chicago. I seemed to be at one with the producers, the photographers, the actors. The Essanay sentiment took possession of me. Then, I come to my friend, Selig, with those grandiose pictures which have made him world famous (and rich). To me there was always something great, spacious, masterful in those Selig productions; I could enter into the sentiment of them. I could feel as the Selig crowd felt when doing their work. Lastly, there are those magnificent Vitagraphs which are so popular now. I like looking at Vitagraph pictures, because I feel and realize the touch of a master hand in their production.

Will these sentiments of mine last and prevail? I am just wondering. For the moment I find myself in a condition of mental quiescence or indifference towards the things which only a few weeks ago I admired, appreciated and exalted. For outside my work on this paper, I have spent many a nickel, many a dime in looking at these pictures and I have induced hundreds of others to do the same; but now I feel very little inclination that way. Why is this? I think it is because some of these picture idols whom I have worshipped turn out to be very much of the "feet of clay" kind. They are not real picture men: that is to say, they themselves have not got the sentiment of the picture. They broke into the game by happy accident. Some of them make good pictures, all of them make money, but few of them like the picture for its ownself—a fact which is sufficiently obvious because they sacrifice sentiment to the god of mammon.

And what is a picture without sentiment?

A. J. Clapham Sues "Film Index" for Libel.

(Communicated.)

Mr. A. J. Clapham, of the Acme Film Company of New York, and treasurer of the National Film Manufacturing and Leasing Company, has retained counsel to institute proceedings against the "Film Index" on the ground that said paper published in its issue of November 5, scandalous and defamatory statements concerning him. The statements, according to expert legal opinion, are deemed just cause for a libel suit.

We understand that the papers have already been served upon the Editor of the "Film Index" for $25,000 damages.

The alleged libel is contained in the following paragraph:

> "It has also been intimated that there is soon to be launched another million dollar picture company that will make all the others look like counterfeit money. This concern is to come in and take care of all those who do not like the 'Sales Company' or the Patents Company. It is promoted by one Clapham, formerly of the Theater Film Service of San Francisco, who went through bankruptcy and stung every one who trusted him as he went through. We fancy that he will become a power in the picture business."

Mr. Clapham informs us that he personally has never gone through bankruptcy.

The Making of a Cameragraph.

It was George Stephenson who said that a locomotive engine consisted of so many thousand parts, and that each part had to be perfect in itself, and in relation to the other parts. These are not his exact words, but his meaning will be plain to the reader. We may apply the Stephensonian maxim to moving picture machinery, whether cameras, projectors, or any other piece of mechanism upon which the picture relies for its ultimate success: that is, its perfect representation before the public. It was A. S. Newman, the well-known British mechanic, who, in a series of articles which we reproduced in the WORLD last year, insisted upon this point—a point which has been seized upon and carried into practice by Nicholas Power of the Power's Cameragraph Company, who, the other day was our escort through the Jacob street works of the Company. Mr. Power showed us over the factory, which owes its success to his initiative and personal attention, with a feeling of pride which he could hardly suppress on beholding the result of his labors in actual operation; namely, the making of a cameragraph.

Few of our readers, whether exchangemen or exhibitors, realize what a considerable business the Power's Cameragraph Company is. Let us, therefore, give place to a few figures regarding these works. Situated in Jacob street, New York City, they occupy several floors. Between one and two hundred men are constantly employed in the making of the cameragraph. The pay-roll runs into several thousands of dollars every week. The value of the machinery can be counted up by tens of thousands of dollars. The Company has a constant demand for skilled mechanics. It is in arrear with its orders, whilst the Cameragraph itself is finding a place in moving picture theaters all over the world. Evidently then, the application of the Stephensonian maxim spells success.

When the Power's Cameragraph leaves the factory, it is, for its purpose, as perfect a piece of mechanism as the mind and hand of man can make it. For this beautiful piece of mechanism is not a piece of casual manufacture, it is a growth, a development, an evolution based upon accumulated observation and experience. Something like a watch, which is in the same category. It is too often the case that pieces of working machinery used for applied industrial purposes are merely assemblages of parts. Before being put into use, or frequently when not in use, they have to be modified to suit the exigencies of particular requirements. Not so with the Power's Cameragraph which leaves nothing to the discretion of its users. It is virtually automatic. It is certainly foolproof, or rather fool resisting. If the operator will do his work properly, the Power's Cameragraph will do its share. This is not to be wondered at, when we perceive how the machine is made. For example: take the drilling of the holes in which the screws engage for the purpose of securing the main body of the machine: powerful machines and exceedingly fine drills ensure the most perfect accuracy in this branch of the work. The result is, that when the parts of the machine are joined up, you have absolute contact, not to speak of closeness of fit. Other machines cut screw-threads out of solid steel, showing that this end of matters must necessarily be accurate. These are only casual examples illustrative of the wonderful care, manifested in adjusting the various parts.

We said that the number six cameragraph was an evolution. In illustration of this point let us refer to some data in substantiation of what we say.

When the No. 6 was first put out, it had metal shoes in place of intermittent and takeup idler rollers, and instead of pivoted top sprocket rollers there were two fixed rollers, set something like 3/8 inch away from the sprocket. This was found impracticable with the new non-inflammable film. The top sprocket now has an idler, the same as the No. 5 machine; the intermittent sprocket has been equipped with an idler roller, in place of the shoe, and the lower, or takeup sprocket, has a double idler which will entirely obviate and prevent the losing of the lower loop. In the first model of the No. 6 the intermittent movement was in the flywheel on the left side of the machine. This has been changed, the flywheel being placed on the operating side of the machine and the intermittent movement enclosed in an oil-tight casing. This improvement secures the advantage of making a better balanced machine, a better appearing machine as well as providing a casing in which oil is retained, so that the star, or cross, and cam run continuously in a well of oil. The intermittent movement of this machine involves a new form of star and cam, as will be seen by reference to the three illustrations. The smaller of these figures shows the star, or rather the heavy steel cross, which replaces the old-style light star. This cross is tempered hard as glass, as is also the diamond and ends of the cam-ring, thus assuring a minimum of friction as well as a maximum of durability. The two larger figures are full-size drawings of the heavy steel cam-ring and cross. One advantage in this movement is that the cross and cam run in the same direction, instead of exactly opposite as in the old-style geneva movement. This not only lessens the wear but tends to hold all lost motion out of the way of the intermittent. By reason of this fact, lost motion in the intermittent sprocket has no effect on the picture.

Mr. Power himself, on the occasion of our visit, demonstrated to us the very great advantage of the new cross movement, the practicable value of which imparts better wearing qualities of the Power's machine.

We must to some extent allow the illustrations reproduced in this article to speak for themselves, as, adequately to describe all that goes on in the Power's machine shop would tax our ingenuity, unless we had command of unlimited space; therefore we could only refer to some salient facts in connection with the work. For example, some of the metal used is specially imported from abroad at a much higher price than the native article calls for, because the foreign made metal is easier to work and lasts longer. Then again, every machine, before it leaves the shop has the very highest tests of efficiency applied to it. Moreover, the Power's Company make their own tools. We saw some of this work in operation. Again, from the handling of the casting up, all the work of preparing and assembling the parts is done at the Power's factory with which Mr. Power himself is still in close personal touch. Finally, the expert advice of F. H. Richardson is sought with regard to the O. K. of each machine before it leaves the works. Nothing, in fact, is omitted to make the Power's Cameragraph what George Stephenson desiderated in his locomotive: a perfect assemblage of perfect parts.

There is a "hospital" at the Power's works. Thither come machines that have been damaged by carelessness or accidents. Thither come machines of other makes which do not leave the Power's works, simply for the reason that they are considered to be unsuitable for again placing on the market.

Necessity obliges the Power's Company to take additional floor space. Besides the machinery and the men that work it, a large part of the present space available is occupied by stores, castings, parts, metal stock, and other things appertaining to the business. The place is not nearly large enough for its purpose, the making of the cameragraph, but in a few months' time, the additional space will be available, and, then, our friend, Nicholas Power will have realized one of his ambitions. He has made a very beautiful machine, and wants a better, larger home for his infant. We hope he will soon have it, and that the Power's Cameragraph will continue to meet with accumulated success. It certainly is, in workshop language, "a very sweet piece of mechanism."

The Resurrection of Lazarus.

AN ECLAIR CHEF D'OEUVRE.

By REV. W. H. JACKSON.

Having been favored with an advanced review of this new film by the Eclair Film Company, it is the writer's pleasure to testify as to its worthiness. All religious subjects must be handled carefully—those pertaining to the Divine life of Jesus especially so. In the "Resurrection of Lazarus" there is every evidence of great care. The first pleasure lies in the assurance that the scenes are actually laid in Palestine, thereby imparting a most necessary truth to such important surroundings. One always fears when approaching reproductions of sacred subjects lest violence be done to the characters, for it is a fault common to humanity that "men rush where angels fear to tread." In this film, however, such is not the case. One feels a gentleness pervading the whole theme which is commendable.

A quiet and reverent demeanor is evident among all those taking part in this work which it is to be hoped may continue in the reproductions of such sacred themes. In commenting upon reproductions of sacred themes it should be a fixed rule that some standard should be adopted, whereby a safe conclusion may be sought as to the value of such reproduction. The writer feels that this standard should be twofold: a literal following of the written account, and a faithful adherence to detail. As the written account is truth, and the only truthful guide it is possible to follow, there is not only every reason for a close observance of the literal detail in its reproduction; but also every reason to exclude any use of the imagination to unduly emphasize any particular part, thereby assuring a careful and faithful reproduction of that "which is written." It is also of importance to remember that the exhibition of such films as the "Resurrection of Lazarus" are for the purpose of exhibition in schools and churches in addition to other places; it is therefore also of paramount importance that they be correct and free from anything that either magnifies or minimizes the truth. The Eclair film measured by these standards maintains a good average; unfortunately a single digression from the exact current of events is introduced, and several very important parts are omitted much to the loss of an otherwise valuable film. For so valuable a subject the short length of the film causes a little disappointment. Had the omissions referred to not been made, a full size reel and more satisfying picture would be the result. This desire for a larger work is a proof of the good quality of that already given and which, we venture to hope, of that which may be forthcoming. The Eclair Company is to be commended for the spirit in which the "Raising of Lazarus" is evidently conceived, and if they continue with a close adherence to the principles herein enunciated they will be warmly supported by a large class of people to whom such pictures are most welcome. It only remains to add that the characters and portraiture were of the highest order.

The Barnstormer in the Photoplay.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

Hush! Curses! S'death! I saw a melodrama Monday at the Fourteenth Street Theater, and the tales we boys used to read, "Searcheek, the Wild Half-breed," or "Ruddy-thumb, the Red-handed Avenger of the Main," were not in it with this photoplay. It went this way:

Enter society villain, dress suit and all. He approaches a New York mansion, accompanied by two ruffians. The ruffians secrete themselves at either side of the brown-stone entrance steps, where the servants and others going in and out of the basement never look. The classy villain mounts the steps, rings and is admitted. He really lives in the rag-picker's hovel, but he must have the Danver's jewels. These villains get into New York society without any trouble. Social aspirants from out of town should study this play. Simply mount the steps, ring the bell and walk in. Now we get a glimpse of high society, and it is the real thing. It walks around aimlessly and looks as though it had on the best stage money could purchase, though it is somewhat nervous and awkward in such unaccustomed finery. Arch villain enters, bows as though he was ducking his head over a plate of soup and kisses each lady's hand. Then he looks around. The way he rolls his eyes would make you shiver. They are perfectly awful. The reason he rolls those fierce eyes is because the villainess is there. He shoots a wireless message at her out of those dreadful eyes. She understands. He must have the Danver's jewels. She gives him a meaning look. The decollete adventuress is also from that finishing school for high society, the rag-picker's hovel. She goes out and comes right back with the jewels. They were left in some handy place. The moment I saw how easy it was, I made up my mind to try it. But how was the villain to get away with the loot? Now you commence to study out how you would do it and you begin to grasp the villain's wonderful foresight in bringing the two ruffians. He puts the jewels in a bag and goes to the window. Outside, the two ruffians are Johnnies on the spot. They are waiting for the swag. Inside, the villain leans on the window sill which the housemaid forgot to dust. They show you the dust on his sleeve in a big picture. Perhaps you don't understand, but, right there, while he was dropping the swag out to his pals, when he leaned his elbow on the sill, he made the mistake of his life. The loss of the jewels is discovered. The villain looks as innocent as the colored boy who said, "I haint seen yer chickens," but Papa Danver telephones to police headquarters. The police moved so quickly that I suspected the operator of whirling the reel. Two detectives appear at the house, Sherlock Carter and Nick Holmes. Sherlock Carter, the handsome guy, is given a dress suit by Papa Danver, and it fits the detective as though it was made for him, then he is introduced to the guests. The very first thing he notices is the dust on the sleeve. That is enough for him. Any man with dust on his sleeve is a villain at heart. Although Sehrlock Carter has all the evidence needed to indicate who stole the jewels, he bides his time. After the ball is over, the villain leaves the mansion unsearched and hands the adventuress into a cab. The moment he gets in, the two detectives hold up the cabby and make him change clothes with Sherlock Carter. Why this act of daring, right there in the street? Because Sherlock Carter knows that the undusted villain must have had accomplices, and he must trace the Danver's jewels to the den of thieves. We are transported to the rag-picker's den. What a tough bunch, all but the rag-picker's beautiful daughter! I couldn't help feeling sorry for her. In spite of unfavorable environment and hereditary tendencies of doubtful value, the rag-picker's daughter was a true-hearted girl. The gang welcomes the society thief and the elegant adventuress, then they step aside to let the detective slip in and hide behind a barrel. That foolhardy act comes near costing him his life. The moment the jewels are shown, he steps forth with two guns and tries to point them at a half dozen people at the same time. Bing! Some fellow gives it to him in the back. Down he goes, and they sew him up in a sack. Then the villain and the ruffians and the adventuress and the rag-picker step out to give the beautiful daughter a chance to do her noble act. She releases Sherlock Carter, then, instead of beating it, she feels that she owes a duty to the homicidal gang. She gets in the sack and the man she has saved sews her up in it. Could anything be more noble? By Jimminy, when you think of the sacrifices women make for men they never saw before in their lives, you cannot wonder that we call them "angel eyes" and "lovey dovey." The gang carries her to the river and swing the bag once. Great heavens! Supposing that one of them, by mere accident, should let his hand slip! It would be all over with the rag-picker's beautiful daughter. The water is real. They swing her two times. We know the next will be the last. What is that fool of a detective doing all this time? Ah! At last! He shows a little common sense. He summons the police. The ruffians are about to make the third swing, the get just about as far as "th—" when, hooray, hooray, the police arrive in the nick of time, save the girl, capture the gang and recover the jewels. Sherlock Carter does not claim any reward when he returns the Danver's jewels. He has his reward. Can't you guess? Why, he marries the beautiful rag-picker's, or the rag-picker's beautiful, daughter. As soon as I finish this article, I am going down among the rag-pickers and see if there are any more. I would like to have one just the same as that.

The melodrama was all right because it did not pretend to be anything else. We go to the auto races, not to gaze upon mangled forms and bloody faces, but because we like to see something really dreadful nearly happen. That feeling of suspense where danger threatens takes hundreds of thousands to watch men fly in the air. I honestly preferred that energetic melodrama to half-efforts shown in some of the higher plays, where the incidents are shown and the soul of the piece totally lost.

THE LAW AND THE EXHIBITOR.

During the last few days several exhibitors have been fined and two sent to prison for flagrant violations of the laws governing moving picture places in New York City.

It is not pleasant to dwell upon another person's misfortune, yet we cannot help drawing attention to the fact that these unfortunate individuals have not only broken the laws of the city and State, but have proved recreant to the principles constantly affirmed in the Moving Picture World. If these men were not readers of the World, such neglect has proved a misfortune to them; if perchance they were occasional readers, their reading was evidently of little effect, or they were of that class to whom professional and moral ethics were as repulsive as the laws of the State, hence they deserved their fate.

If these men were of the latter class, can there be any surprise that as such they feed the voracious appetite of the scavenging newspaper, and the "slumming" reformers? The Moving Picture World has no patience with, and no sympathy for, those who pull down to their own moralless depths any who ever so innocently come within the range of their low levels.

With a weeding out of the "black sheep," and a constant endeavor shown by others to uplift the whole nature of the moving picture, it cannot be long before the standard set in these pages will be reached and all excuses for the critic removed.

THE "CHANGE DAILY" ABUSE.

The article published last week from the pen of C. W. Lawford on the "Change Daily" abuse deserves further comment. There can be little doubt that whereas a little while ago we wrote that the power of the cinematograph was still in its infancy, it is now maturing so rapidly as to be classed as having outgrown its infantile or initial stage. This cannot be said of the pictures, they are not growing out of or from their early environments to keep pace with a reasonable expectation of their possibilities.

One of the first proofs of the coming of the picture to its proper standard will be shown when it can afford to shake off the "daily change." When we compare the good work of the picture with the poor work of the vaudeville, we find it impossible to explain why the vaudeville can be repeated six times a day, six days a week, and the pictures "changed daily." It has already been shown that the change as necessary from the demands of the public is a fallacy, in that the same public does not go and tolerate repeated vaudeville for the sake of changed pictures.

Further than this, it is also a fallacy to suppose that the same people go over and over again and so demand the changes; we contend that the audience is continually changing, and even if there is a large floating class who go daily to the theater, they change their theater and do not sit in one chair day after day and ask for the change of the attraction. Again "daily change" charges the public with having an unnatural, even gluttonous, appetite, which when studied become discreditable. Think of it—five different subjects a day, six days a week, thirty different subjects a week necessary to satisfy these gormandizers if "daily change" is essential.

Apropos of the non-growth shown in picture work, we would say that this should refer to the size of the play or subject, rather than the quality of it. Suppose instead of four different subjects in one hour we had a four-film length of one subject, take as an illustration "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The writer of these comments has not yet been able to see this subject is full although in constant attendance at the various theaters, attributable to the fact that first it was shown in sections, and when complete was, under the "daily change" rule, presented once and passed along into oblivion.

If "Uncle Tom's Cabin" cannot stand for a week it speaks badly for many other subjects, but we believe it can and will. The multitude of subjects being released weekly reminds one of a library of cheap novels, and herein lies one of the evils which is creating such a demand for censorship. If film makers would put the same amount of good work in one subject four times the duration of four subjects, they would be able to produce or even reproduce some of the best subjects of the times, the result of this would be summarized as follows: Growth in better work, the elimination or poorer and censor subject work, the pressure upon the vaudeville would press it aside, and last, but not least, a nearer resemblance to a living theater would result and a marked progress made in an ideal moving picture theater.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

By Frank R. Madison.

Seven moving picture houses are now operating in Springfield, Ill., and with the exception of the Grand, which is practically a new house, all have been established long enough to have gained a foothold. All seem to be doing at least a good business and several of them are flourishing. They are: Lyric, H. T. Loper, proprietor; Vaudette (10 cents), W. W. Watts, proprietor; Savoy, W. W. Watts, proprietor; Royal, Karzin & Mills, proprietors; Casino, Karzin & Mills, proprietors; Grand, Kunz Amusement Company, proprietors; Colonial, Baker & Moore, propretors.

The Lyric is unusually well favored in the way of location, being but a few doors from the principal corner in the city, which is used as a street car transfer point. The advent of the proprietor, Harry T. Loper, into the moving picture business is out of the ordinary. In 1908 Loper was running a cafe in the building which he now occupies. It enjoyed a high-class patronage, especially among visitors to the State capital. On the night of August 14, 1908, a mob threatened to take two negroes from the Sangamon county jail and lynch them. The sheriff impressed Loper and his speedy touring car into service and the blacks were spirited away to a nearby city. After his return from the trip the race rioters wreaked vengeance upon Loper by wrecking his automobile and cafe, beginning three days of spasmodic lawlessless which was checked only by the arrival of State troops. After the trouble had subsided Loper refurnished and reopened the cafe but it never again enjoyed a really prosperous business.

He converted the place into a moving picture house, putting in an inclined floor and simple but attractive front. The decorating of the walls and ceiling was sufficient. Business has been good with him at all times and a surmise that the new enterprise is or will prove as profitable as the old is not bold.

The place is well ventilated. First run films, changed daily, are projected by an, apparently, capable operator. The illustrated songs are above the average; a naturally sweet, girlish voice, strong enough for the room, is used with understanding and is never sttrained. The pianist is also clever but there is no unusual attempt at appropriate music for the pictures, a gap in an otherwise excellent show which might be filled. This place has a heavy patronage of high school students who repress all exuberance except when whistleable tunes are played. It was somewhat abrupt when, lost in the climax of the Biograph, "The Man and the Oath," those who live with the pictures were struck by the piano and chorus in a popular tune. As a whole the Lyric is a pretty, popular and well conducted amusement house.

Records of the Peoria, Ill., fire department will verify "Man-About-Town's" answer to the correspondent who deplored the lack of moving pictures of American police and fire departments. When filming was young this city had several reels of pictures taken, showing all the departments, both central and outlying, on review and in action. A large tent was secured and veterans who had been disabled in service or were too old for duty had charge of an exhibition at the State and county fairs, reunions and picnics. The money realized therefrom went into the fireman's pension fund. I understand that the department is about to replace these with more up-to-date views of the fire fighters.

The Editor, Ridgewood, N. J., a magazine for writers, starting, just arriving and who have arrived, assures the ambitious scenario writers that moving picture producers are really eager to get good plays. A contributor to the Editor who suspected that manuscripts were invited in order that the manufacturers might steal ideas was answered by an amateur who had sold a number of scenarios. The latter also found the companies courteous and as a rule prompt. Epes Winthrop Sargent, of the Lubin studio, and others have given points for the ambitious scenario writer in this publication.

When Blanche Bates was touring the Middle West in "The Fighting Hope" there was one little bit the advance man always felt sure of getting past the lookout man in the newspaper offices. This morsel was never the stuff left to be run but inadvertently mentioned. Miss Bates, it was accidentally learned, was such a stickler for realism that when she took the part of the stenographer she insisted upon having the letter head of the firm she was supposed to be working for, even though the audience could not see the sheet. I was reminded of this by contrast when, in a recent film, a man discharged by a revengeful superintendent, received a note written on a plain sheet of paper, even though the company itself was supposed to be releasing him and the message was dictated. At another show a telegraph operator sat behind me when a message was flashed upon the screen. The Western Union blank was all right but the operator decried the fact that there was no address on the message, simply "Julian is dying. Mother" and that the check marks needed to make the message realistic were missing. These apparently are small points, but their value may be great.

The Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures were not shown in Springfield, Ill., the council early putting a ban upon the exhibition in the city. Then C. D. G. Johnson, manager of White City, an amusement park just outside the corporate limits, advertised his proposed exhibition heavily. Upon the eve of the performance he was notified by Sheriff Charles Werner, of Sangamon county, that in view of the race riots two years before the films could not be shown and any attempt to do so would be resisted. Governor Deneen had previously notified a committee of protesting ministers that he would not interfere, but would support the sheriff in any action. No attempt was made to show the pictures.

NEW MOTIOGRAPH AGENCIES.

The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company announce that they have established the following agencies in Canada: Charles Potter, Toronto, Ont.; Great Western Film Company, Winnipeg, Man.; Crystal Palace Film Exchange, Montreal, Que.

A meeting of great interest was held in the Starland Theater, of Edmonton, Alberta, Can., a few days ago in the presence of about twenty operators and managers and others. The demonstration was given by E. A. Schultz, of Chicago, of the latest model Motiograph machine. The demonstration was pronounced by the News, of Edmonton, Alberta, as being successful in every way, and that Mr. Schultz succeeded in convincing those present of the superiority of the Motiographs over other machines.

THE TOURNAMENT FILM.

A. A. Gotshall Takes Issue with T. R.

During the week of August 22, 1910, there was held in the city of Cheyenne, Wyo., under the direction of the Business Men's Industrial Club, a Frontier Celebration, being the fourteenth annual, and also, in all likelihood, the last event of its kind, and therefore presented on a scale of magnificence and magnitude not heretofore attempted.

Against his first determination, Theodore Roosevelt, the greatest American citizen of to-day, was persuaded to accept an invitation to attend this wonderful presentation of Western frontier life as it really existed in times gone by, by a committee of business men representing the Cheyenne Industrial Club, which met T. R. at Khartoum on the day the Mighty Hunter first emerged from his trip through the African jungles.

In fulfillment of his promise to attend this presentation of the wild glories of a vanished Western border, he arrived at Cheyenne on Saturday, August 27, as the guest of the entire Western population in Cheyenne assembled.

After reviewing the wonderful parade of cowboys, cowgirls, Indians, etc., he witnessed at Frontier Park a performance so wonderful in its stirring Western scenes and frontier events, as to call for a general summing up by the illustrious Teddy himself, as follows: "The greatest frontier spectacle that could possibly be staged upon the face of the earth in 1910."

Working under exclusive contracts with the Cheyenne Committee in charge of this great Indian and Cowboy Frontier Celebration, was The Tournament Film Company, of Toledo, Ohio, a film producing company which devotes its entire time and money and energies to the exclusive production of instructive and educational films.

With its eight or ten men upon the ground taking motion pictures of this great Western spectacle for future production, the manager in charge of this corps of skilled moving picture photographers, takes exception to a certain portion of Mr. Roosevelt's speech, delivered as the opening number of the Frontier Celebration, in which he spoke as follows:

"In Frederick Remington's pictures all the most vivid and characteristic features of the Western pioneer life which is just closing were set forth, and he has commemorated forever the men of the plains and the mountains as they actually were."

Without in even the slightest degree wishing to dim the lustre of Mr. Remington's fame and achievements, we fully believe that the motion picture producers should at least share the glory attributed to Mr. Remington. He was an artist, fired with all the artistic imagination and genius for color which he so aptly injected into his wonderful pictures.

The motion picture producer, on the other hand, with his wonderful camera without a soul or artistic temperament upon which to draw for color schemes, catches the red blood stirring scenes of the Western frontier, as produced at this Frontier Celebration at Cheyenne, as they really are; and these wonderful pictures will be reproduced for the entertainment, education and delight of millions of people throughout not only the United States but the entire civilized world, giving these same millions of people an exact and correct idea of the great West as it really did exist and in some measure exists even to-day, and not a highly colored, artistic reproduction of an artist's imagination, even though this artist be Frederick Remington.

Therefore, honor to whom honor is due; share and share alike to Frederick Remington and the motion picture producer.

The Tournament Film Company's reels reproducing the wondrous scenes of the Frontier Celebration will no doubt meet with the greatest demand ever accorded any set of feature films and should prove to this enterprising and commendable concern as great a financial success as their educational and entertaining qualities warrant.

The past eight or ten days have been most strenuous for the moving picture people in New York City. The developments of the strike precipitated by the drivers and helpers employed in the city by the several express companies clearly demonstrated that the motion picture business is one of the very first to be seriously affected by anything that may transpire to interfere with the regular routine of any transportation system.

I visited a film renting house last Wednesday and found the managers in a most troubled state of mind. Of course the answer to my query was that the express companies' labor troubles were responsible. When I expressed surprise that the motion picture people, who have established a world-wide reputation for foresight, alertness and ability to cope with emergencies, should find themselves in a state of utter helplessness, the grieved ones confessed that for once at least they had been caught unawares. This explanation was offered: The strike was so carefully and quietly planned that very few people heard even rumors of its approach, and only the same number realized it was on until the second or third day after it was declared. Those who heard the rumors and became aware of the existence of the strike when it first went into effect attached little importance to it. The United States Express Company helpers were the first to go out. The picture people, like many in other branches of business, simply looked about to see what other express companies could take shipments of films for the points covered by that particular company. They seemed to have no idea that the strike would spread to a general tie-up, as it did.

Even this situation created no serious apprehension on the part of the picture people. Exchange customers who were within traveling distance were notified of the conditions and given the option of traveling to the city for their changes of film, or having them expressed subject to any delay the conditions might create. The branch offices of the express companies were receiving shipments only subject to delay in handling goods in the city. In other words, they would receive shipments, but would not guarantee to get them on the trains in less than two or three days because the strikers had started to hold up wagons in charge of strike breakers and were mobbing the men. Finally, all the branch offices stopped doing business and the express companies announced that only goods delivered at the main depots by the consignors could be handled. Oh, very well, said the film men, there are plenty of local express companies that can take the films to the depots; and they did, until the drivers and helpers of these companies also sympathized with the others and struck.

Tighter and tighter the lines were drawn and each day the situation became more critical, but the picture men managed to cope with it by making their working force, or requiring the exhibitors to become a composite driver, helper and truck horse. Jersey City for a time was the main seat of trouble and violence, and conditions became so aggravated in that place, Communipaw and Hoboken that even individuals carrying goods in their hands to the express offices were intimidated and assaulted. This gradually spread to the New York dockages of the various ferry lines, but to no serious extent, and I have failed to hear of any people carrying films having been molested.

But I have only referred to the exchanges and exhibitors. The people who felt the strike with the greatest force were the manufacturers of the films and their direct agents. They were subjected to the most exasperating and discouraging conditions, but handled them with admirable resourcefulness and effect. The violence of the mobs after the strike assumed a formidable aspect made private teamsters timid and they were by no means favorable to carting goods to the depots and taking chances of being held up and beaten, or injured by pieces of rock, iron, bottles, etc., hurled by the assembled strikers. The taxicabs and covered wagons were brought into play by the New Jersey manufacturers in getting their films to New York and also in reaching the several depots of the city, and this source of relief was about to be cut off when a fortunate change in the strike situation took place.

On Wednesday of the past week the strikers let it become known that if the strike was not ended, or some well-defined steps were not taken to end it, that night not a vehicle of transportation, other than the trolley and elevated lines, in the city would be in operation on Thursday. At the same time the longshoremen, it was stated, would join the strikers. People who can recall the last longshoremen's strike in New York can realize what they would do to make the stoppage of transportation of goods effective. Wednesday afternoon brought good news. Steps had been taken to let the strikers resume work pending an arbitration of the matters in dispute before a board of seven members. This caused all the moving picture people to indulge in one great sigh of relief. In connection with the arbitration movement, I wish to mention an interesting feature. The chairman of the board is Mayor W. J. Gaynor, of New York. It seems he is destined to get connected with everything of a public nature in relation to motion pictures. When he was a Judge of the Supreme Court in Brooklyn he granted injunctions that enabled six hundred or more exhibitors in Greater New York to reopen their places after they had been unexpectedly closed by Mayor McClellan on a Christmas Eve, and the picture men did not fail to return the favor when the Judge ran for Mayor. Now that he is chairman of the arbitrators, they rely upon him to relieve them of any further troubles arising from the strike. I overlooked another instance wherein the Mayor figured prominently in connection with the motion picture business. That was when, a few months ago, certain people called upon him to urge the closing of picture houses exhibiting pictures his visitors deemed improper. The Mayor refused to interfere because he could find no law under which he could act, and the Corporation Counsel could find none, neither could the Attorney-General, when appealed to.

In this connection I will say that if some of the municipal authorities elsewhere would emulate the principles of Mayor Gaynor they would be credited with more common sense and spirit of justice than they have been. No people in either the amusement or commercial world have been more unreasonably provoked and, I may say, persecuted, than the motion picture exhibitors. It seems that the sole ambition of certain people in all parts of the country is to find some flaw, some loophole, some excuse whereby the long-suffering exhibitor can be put to trouble and expense, or put out of business altogether. It is sincerely hoped that some day these people will wake up and display more sense of reason and justice, and not look upon the pictures as does created for the generation of vice and immorality; that they will awaken to the truth and be able to lead themselves to a realization that all the law-abiding, respectable and reputable citizens of the country are outside the ranks of the moving picture people and that moving pictures convey to both old and young as commendable lessons and ideas as are expounded in the best of places or best of books.

Reverting to the effect of the strike upon the moving picture interests, I was seated in an exchange the other day when one of the staff remarked that what had happened was a strong reminder of what the film people would be up against in the event of an extended railroad strike. "I hate to think of it," said a listener. Another member of the staff added: "I am going to become an aviator and when I get my diploma I'll invest in a biplane, monoplane, or some such contrivance, with a good-sized freight compartment attachment so that, should anything of that kind occur I can glide off the roof with a fine assortment of changes in programs for our out-of-town customers." An exhibitor listening to the conversation said: "You no doubt intend to get off a piece of comedy, but you may be, unconsciously, predicting what will take place before a great while."

"Who's looney now?" Nature endowed me with a fly paper memory. Do you know what a fly paper memory is? I will tell you, little boys and girls. It is the antithesis of the sieve-like memory. To have a memory like a sieve is to disremember everything. For everything runs through your memory just as it runs through a sieve. A fly-paper memory, however, is one to which things stick just as flies stick to the paper. When they come in contact with the fatal mucilage, they cannot get away. My memory, then, is a mucilaginous one, as many people are finding out, and many more people in the moving picture field have yet to find out.

If I were superstitious, I should say that it was the hand of fate that took me to the Imperial Hotel on January 9, 1909. The Film Service Association was being disbanded at the bidding of the Edison people of Orange, N. J.—the Edison people having no further use for it. That afternoon I was a "chiel," a very new "chiel," taking notes, mental notes: "Photographically lined, on the tablets of my mind, till a yesterday has faded from its page," to quote one of my favorite authors, W. S. Gilbert. What I heard that afternoon comes in useful now in taking stock of two years' "control" of the moving picture field by the trust or Motion Picture Patents Company of 80 Fifth avenue.

For the moment, one little phrase sounds in my ears, over all the din that filled the lobbies of the Imperial Hotel on the afternoon of January 9, 1909: "What is the good of them? Who are they? What have they got? Nothing? Of course I've gone over." This was the utterance of a man who had hitherto been one of the props, in fact the greatest prop, of the Independent side of the moving picture industry. Some of my readers can guess whose personality I am hinting at. No, he is not a New Yorker! He is not a manufacturer! This narrows down your opportunity for making a mistake in guessing the name.

The sentiment of that afternoon, as voiced by the speaker, who little suspected that what he said would fall into the ears of such an unforgetting, unforgiving person as your Lux Graphicus, was that independence in the way of moving picture making, renting and exhibiting was not to be dreamed of. The people at 80 Fifth avenue, under the charge of the amiable Dwight MacDonald, evidently thought so too. They evidently thought so out at Orange. They evidently thought so out in Chicago. Yet all these wiseacres were wrong. They were short-sighted. In their minds, the wish was father to the thought.

What is the sequel to that meeting at the Imperial Hotel? This: If the Motion Picture Patents Company and some of its licensees dropped into the ocean to-morrow or were swept away by a cyclone, they would not be missed. In proof of which you have only to look at this paper. Herein are fifteen stalwart Independent manufacturers making and marketing just as good pictures as Patents Company's licensees. They have just as much right to exist as the Patents Company licensees; they emphatically disprove the utterance of the Imperial Hotel oracle by showing that they can do what the Patents Company's "licensees" are doing—make and sell moving pictures. At this moment probably forty per cent. of the moving picture theaters of this country are running Independent pictures. I am generally successful as a prophet, and six months from now I prophesy that sixty per cent. of those theaters will be Independent. "Who's looney now?"

Cool reasoners in January, 1909, could see that an Independent side was bound to eventuate, as it is eventuating now. The moving picture industry is beyond the control of any one individual or group of individuals, either at Orange or any other part of this country. For a time, I must confess myself as having had a distinct leaning towards the Patents Company because I believed that its operations were for the good of the business as a whole. I was mistaken. In my scheme of things the trust or Patents Company at this moment is not in existence. It has no importance, no authority, no prescriptive position. It is nothing but an unimportant holding company, absolutely entitled to no more consideration than any other body which seeks to control as large as possible a section of the business for themselves.

"By their deeds ye shall know them."

The record of the Patents Company will be subjected to examination in future issues of this paper, so I need not dwell upon that theme now. My present object is simply to bring to the attention of those whom it may concern the fact that the Independent sentiment is advancing by leaps and bounds. A few months ago two of the trust stalwarts and myself were chatting over the situation. They derided the Independents as a "lean" lot, and pointed to the fact that the trust people were fat. I have lately come across several Independent manufacturers, renters, etc. They have very fine automobiles, plenty of diamonds, and apparently plenty of money, and, what is most to the point, their factories are working to capacity.

THE BIO ARC SCREEN.

A Little Device for Watching the Carbon Tips.

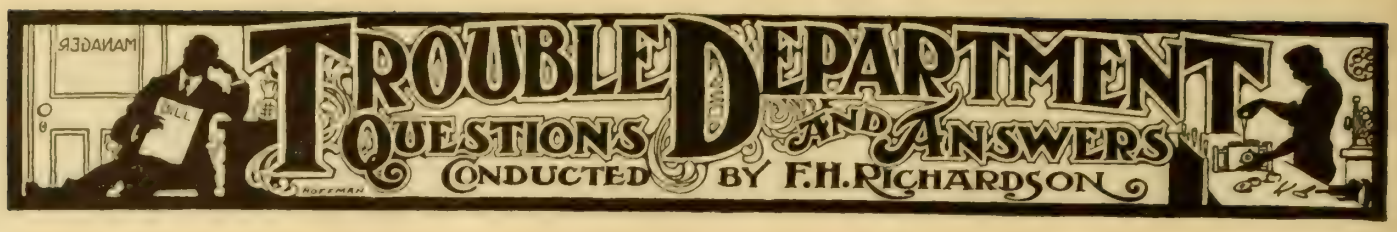
The Charles L. Kiewert Company has just placed upon the market a simple little device that will be appreciated by every operator. It is called the Bio Arc Screen, and is intended for attachment to the lamp house door in such a way as to show a full size, accurate reproduction of the arc outside the lamp house. The device is small and compact and may be attached to any lamp house door in two or three minutes and will not interfere in the least with the ordinary operation of the machine. The image of the arc is an exact reproduction but sufficiently subdued so as to occasion no discomfort to the eye in looking at it. The outlines of every portion of the arc are clear and distinct and in this respect it is far superior to the ruby glass covered peephole ordinarily used. The latter shows only those portions of the arc which contain red rays, and naturally the form of the arc itself which contains practically no red rays, is not shown at all. As the shape of the arc—that is the bluish flame between the carbon tips—is of the utmost importance in judging of the condition of the light, the necessity of this device will be at once appreciated. The image of the arc is visible from the operator's usual position; furthermore, his eye is subjected to no strain whatever, and he may quickly shift his glance from the arc image to his picture without the temporary blindness which always follows taking the eye from a powerful source of light to a weaker.

This device has been tried out in practice before being placed on the market, the Charles L. Kiewert Company having placed models in the hands of its salesmen for this purpose, and they state that every operator who saw the device immediately expressed a wish to purchase it.

ACCESSORIES FOR MOVING PICTURE WORK.

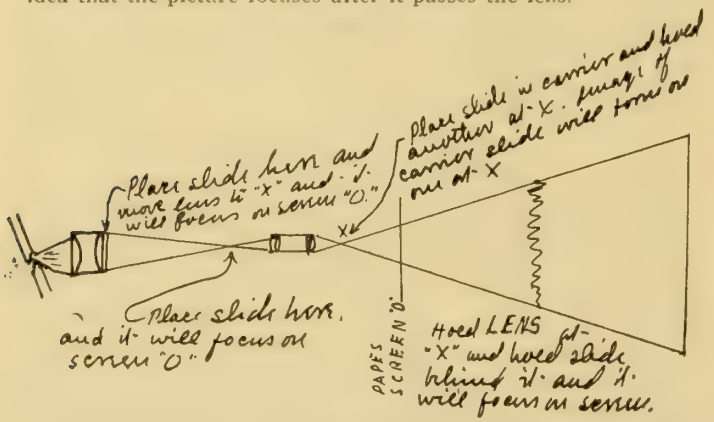
Genuine Antique Store Gets a Move On.

In recent times the manufacturers of moving picture films have realized the advantage of "dressing" their picture with correct, tasteful furniture, costumes and accessories. This policy adds enormously to the value of the stage effects. Mr. S. M. Jacobi, General Director of the Genuine Antique Store, which specially caters for this class of business, informs us that his firm has been compelled, by the growth of its business, to lease a five-story building at 5 East Thirtieth street, New York City. These enlarged premises will give increased facilities for the conduct of the business in the selling and hiring of accessories, etc., for the moving picture trade. A feature is made of correct period furniture, and there are costumes and accessories from the modern costumers. An assortment of arms and armor is always kept in stock. Other features include drapery and rugs, statuary, brass, curios, china, silverware personally gathered in all parts of the world. Our manufacturing readers should make a point of taking advantage of the service offered by the Genuine Antique Store.



Light Rays Again.—Edward Harford, operator, Salt Lake City, contributes the following: "In the current issue of the World, I note what you say of the action of the light rays in the condenser. In the past this has been something of a puzzle to me. I discovered what I am about to describe by accident, and until the articles on light rays came up I always considered a point in front of the objective lens as the focussing point of the picture. If you care to see the matter of focussing solved you may do so by placing a sheet of paper about fourteen inches in front of the objective lens. Now light your lamp and, unscrewing the lens from machine head but holding it in the same relative position, move it straight forward into the place where the light rays cross in front of the lens and you will get a clear focus of the condenser. If your back condenser is broken the break will show up clearly.

"Possibly this may be of no use to you, but it may clear up the idea that the picture focuses after it passes the lens."



Place slide here and it will focus on screen "O."
Place slide here and move lens to "X" and it will focus on screen "O."
Place slide in carrier and hold another at X. Image of carrier slide will come on at X X
PAPER SCREEN "O"
Hold LENS at "X" and hold slide behind it and it will focus on screen.

Friend Harford has not conveyed his idea very clearly. The accompanying diagram, however, suggests some interesting experiments. As I understand it, his idea is to place a paper screen some fourteen inches in front of the lens and then unscrewing the lens move it straight out towards this temporary screen. I haven't time to study the thing out, and pass it up to our readers with the suggestion to neighbor Harford that he be more careful in his next letter to make things just a little clearer.

Films Get Out of Focus.—Los Angeles, Cal. (Warren C. Thomas) writes as follows: "For the benefit of Delhi, N. Y., and others who have trouble with the film getting out of focus, I would suggest the bending of the tension springs so they are just a trifle closer together at the top than at the bottom; also to see that the guides on the framing guage plate are not worn down on the inside more than on the outside. The setting of the tension springs, as above described, will tend to stretch the film tightly across the gauge. If the guides are worn down it will tend to cause 'bulging,' which is especially noticeable on thin film stock. In your answer to Weatherford, Okla., why not use a double throw switch with the lamp circuit on the middle poles, the A. C. on one side and the D. C. on the other? That will save the extra switch mounting circuit and the padlock idea. Also, it will give immediate cross-over service and you could not feed the A. C. into the D. C. line, or vice versa."

Many thanks, Neighbor Thomas, on behalf of our readers for the idea of the set of tension springs. Personally, I am a little skeptical about its efficiency, but would recommend that it be tried out. What Neighbor Thomas means by "guides on the framing gauge" is the film track on the aperture plate. Time and again I have cautioned our readers about running with worn aperture plate tracks. Friend Thomas is perfectly correct: worn aperture plate tracks will be more than likely to bulge the film. As to the switch problem, I am getting it handed to me all around on that particular proposition. Your suggestion is good, and I have had two sets of wiring diagrams sent me of double throw connection of which you speak.

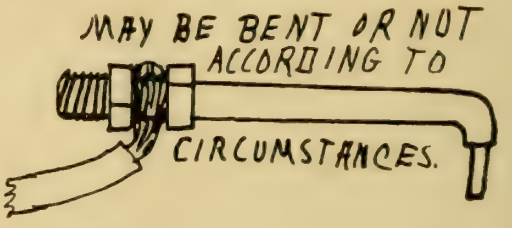
Wire Terminals.—E. C. Shearer, Oakdale, Cal., writes as follows: "Having noticed several complaints in The Column regarding the tendency of wire terminals to burn off, I shall proceed to give my remedy, which has proven very successful in my own case. I had considerable trouble with the wires burning off inside my lamp house and last December made two copper bolts about 1½ inches long, threaded ¾ inch on one end, on which I placed two nuts. I then filed down the other end so that it would fit the hole in the lug of the lamp arm. I twist the wires around the bolt between the nuts and screw them up tight together and then place the other end of the bolt in the holes in the lamp arm where the wires ordinarily go, clamping them in with the thumb screws. I have been using these same bolts about eleven months and have not had a particle of trouble. If this is any good, you may publish it; if not, throw it in the wastebasket."



I am not throwing any communications of this kind in the wastebasket, Neighbor Shearer. It is just such ideas as this we want, and it is the interchange of ideas of this kind that largely goes to make up the value of the Trouble Department. I thank you and all others who send in such things. They are exceedingly valuable and I am sure are appreciated by all those who are readers of our Department. Come again.

A Whole Bundle of Them.—New York City, N. Y., writes as follows: "Allow me to trouble you with a few questions that have been puzzling me.

"1. Certain projection lenses have the back or equivalent focus stamped on them, and by that mark you can figure out the size of picture at a certain throw, approximately.

"2. The size of the pictures are standard, ¾ by 1 inch. Aren't all aperture openings the same? If they are, what is the use of measuring them? If they are made to standard, what is the correct size?

"3. Are we allowed to use 220 volts for projection in New York City?

"4. What is the simplest way to tell whether it is 110 or 220 volts?

"5. Can a Hallberg economizer designed for 220 volts be used on 110?

"6. What is the fundamental principle upon which an economizer depends for its action, and how many windings or coils are used?

"7. Can the enclosed arc lamps (not flaming ones) that are used on D. C. also be used on A. C.?

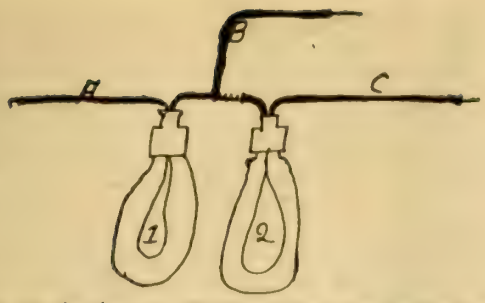
"8. Do all arc lamps consume the same amount of current?

"9. We use two enclosed arc lamps in series on A. C. Can I just take these off, hook on two flaming arcs instead, also A. C., or does it require experience to make these changes?"

1. I do not know of any lenses having the equivalent or back focus stamped on them, though possibly there may be. For directions as to how to figure lenses, I refer you to my answer to North Yakima, Washington, in last week's paper. If you know the equivalent focus of your lens you may find the size picture it will project at a given distance by multiplying the throw in feet by the width of the aperture and dividing the product by the focal length of the lens.

2. All apertures are not of the same width; they are supposed to be standard, and approximately 15-16 by 11-16 of an inch, but they are not; and a little bit of difference in the width of the aperture will make a big difference on the screen, particularly if it be a long throw. Accurate measurement of the width of the aperture is, therefore, necessary in figuring the lenses.

3. The Bureau of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity informs me that it is quite permissible to bring 220 volts pressure into a New York operating room and use same for projection, providing, of course, you install the proper resistance to take care of that pressure.



4. Look at the lamps. Perhaps they are marked with their voltage. If not connect two new 110 volt lamps, 1 and 2, in series as per sketch:

Always use new lamps for testing. Touch wire A to one of the circuit wires and wire C to the other. If the lamps burn with ordinary brilliance (up to candle power) the line carries 220 volts. If they only burn red (far below candle power) touch wire A and wire B to the wires of the circuit. If, on the second test, the lamp 1 burns with ordinary brilliance the line carries 110, if somewhat below c. p. the voltage is probably 105; if with somewhat more than ordinary brilliance then the voltage will probably be 115 or 125. With a little experience one is able to judge voltage very closely by using a test lamp.

5. A Hallberg economizer built for 220 volts cannot be used on 110 volts. You would not get anywhere near enough current. You would have to have the instrument rewound for 110 volts.

6. The basic principle of the transformer (economizers, inductors, compensarcs, etc., are nothing more nor less than low voltage transformers) is the law of electro-magnetic action which recites that a wire within the magnetic field of another wire carrying current will, by induction, receive an impulse of current at the instant the current starts or stops, and as often as the current starts or stops in the primary circuit. To fully explain in detail the action of transformers would require much more space than I have available this week. Upon the relative number of turns in the primary and secondary coils of the transformer will depend the secondary voltage (the less number of turns, within certain limits, in the secondary in relation to the number in the primary, the lower the secondary voltage). Upon the voltage of the secondary depends the number of amperes which will be forced through the resistance of the arc.

7. No. The construction of the alternating current and direct current lamps is quite different.

8. Different types and sizes of arc lamps consume different amounts of current, some using several times as much as others.

9. It requires experience, since some questions of arc and line voltage have to be considered.

One for Neighbor Crowe.—Stromsburg, Neb. (W. Batterson) writes as follows: "I have read A. W. Crowe's letter regarding lenses in the issue of October 22. Neighbor Crowe says the condenser inverts the picture. I claim that the condensers have nothing to do with the inversion. If he will continue his experiments with the piece of mica removing the condensers so that the light will strike the mica without passing through them, he will get the same result as with the condensers in use. It must, therefore, be the projection lens that inverts the picture. Were the picture between the light and condensers, they might have something to do with it. As it is, however, the only office the condensers perform is to do what their name implies—condense the light, bringing the rays down to the aperture in a bright round spot. I think when the light passes through the picture and strikes the back lens of the projector the work of the condenser is completed, and the light rays handled from there on by the projection lens. I do not believe the light rays from the condenser cross at all, from the fact that the back lens of the projector changes their course of travel before they have a chance to go far enough to cross. Of course, those same rays cross after leaving the projection lens, but the condensers have nothing to do with that.

"Have you had any 'slats busted' yet, friend Richardson?"

Nope, my slats are still in good working order, praise be! Your ideas seem to hang together pretty well. I am not going to argue this light ray proposition—yet. I welcome these letters because they show that the operators are beginning to study, and the more study on matters pertaining to projection, the better. We will get that light ray proposition straightened out yet, Friend Batterson. I just want to add this word, however, to your own, for the benefit of Neighbor Crowe and others: Take out the projection lens, cut a small hole in a piece of heavy cardboard or tin—a hole say ¼ inch in diameter. Place this in the slide carrier and light your lamp, leaving the film gate open. You will find a photograph of the arc projected on the curtain bottom side up, and it will be a pretty good photograph, too. Moreover, you will find a whole lot of interest in this experiment, since you can study that arc photograph and possibly learn a few things about the arc.

In Australia. In Australia they are projecting moving pictures, 35 feet wide, using from 90 to 100 amperes of current to do it. In England they are using 80 to 90 amperes of current for projection. In New York City our wise law makers for a long time limited the current to 25 amperes. Quite a difference from 25 and 100, and you haven't heard of anybody being killed in England or Australia, or any property being burned up any more than there has been in New York City. In England also they run with the whole back out of the lamp house. There is just exactly as much danger of setting fire to anything through having the back out of the lamp house as there is of setting fire to New York Bay with a cigar butt—our distinguished friends of the Electrical Department to the contrary notwithstanding. In New York, and other cities, operators have to obey a lot of fool rules and laws, and as long as they are laws it is up to the operator to obey them; but if the fool-killer were anywhere around, he would certainly knock the brains out of a few of the rules that have been made for the government of operating rooms in New York and other cities, and one of the first of those rules to 'get it' would be the one requiring the operator to run with a tightly closed lamp house. That particular thing is very costly in several ways, notably in condenser breakage, and it is all pure piffle, bunk and nonsense. If the Electrical Department of the City of New York can set forth facts to the contrary we shall be very glad to give them space in these columns. I firmly believe in making operating rooms safe, and thoroughly safe, but this matter of safety can be run into the ground just like anything else, and it has been in some particulars.

That Double Connection Again.—Seattle, Wash. (H. E. Cawthorn) writes as follows: "I have been a reader of the World since its first issue, and have noticed the praise you get from operators and managers all over the country. Therefore, will not try to express myself, but just let you consider me as the most complimentary of them all, which expresses my sentiments in regard to the paper. I would like to make a few comments regarding a diagram that appeared in October 15 issue. Now, Friend Richardson, like yourself, I am an old-timer, and admit to being a crank on things pertaining to good projection. Wiring is my hobby, and I would like to submit the enclosed diagram for the use of our friend in Weatherford, Okla. Your diagram would work out all right and give satisfaction in the hands of a good operator, but it is by no means fool-proof, and I fear would cause trouble for many of your readers. Besides, I think you will find that most cities require double throw switches, where that kind of a connection is made. Now, Friend Richardson, don't you take this as a roast for it is not. I have been Chairman of the Examining Committee of our Local Union, No. 154, I. A. T. S. E., and I know that not a few use your Department of the World as authority on everything pertaining to the picture game, and it would place a committee in a bad position to turn down a man on something he had learned through your Column."

Neighbor Cawthorn then explains his diagram, which is essentially the same as one already submitted by a correspondent from San Francisco who has suggested that instead of printing these diagrams at this time I ask for a submission of how the connection referred to should be made, which I have done. Both your own and the San Francisco sketches are very cleverly done, and one or the other of them will be published later. Meanwhile, you have our thanks for sending in such an excellent sketch and letter. Do not be afraid to correct me when you think I am wrong. I don't pretend to know it all and do not ever expect to, though I really did know better than to submit that particular kind of a proposition, and you are perfectly right in calling me down for it. Come again. The latch string is always hanging out.

Local Union No. 182.—Boston, Mass. (Harry Danto), writes: "Local Union, No. 182, Moving Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union held its regular meeting at the headquarters, 724 Washington street, and quite a few of the outstanding moving picture theaters have come into line."

Friend Danto, you get a motion through at the next meeeting of allowing you another bottle of ink. For sawed-off brevity, your last letter is, I believe, entitled to first prize. Business agent Bernard Corbett of the Boston Union called on me a few days ago and I enjoyed quite a pleasant chat with him. I hope to be able to visit you boys before very long. Meanwhile, don't be quite so stingy with your paper and ink.

Condenser Breakage.—R. M. Davidson, Binghamton, N. Y., writes as follows: "Your Column is of great assistance to operators and should be also to managers. I haven't seen any letters from managers, however, but trust they are not barred. I follow up The Column very closely and have received much valuable information from it and, therefore, feel obliged to contribute when I learn anything that will be of assistance to the business in general. With your permission, therefore, here is my mite.

"Where high amperage is used there has been a great deal of trouble from condenser breakage. We are using 65 amperes, which I believe is unusually high, and have had more than our share of this trouble. I have, however, evolved a scheme which has stopped it and I am sure will stop it for anyone else who tries it. Briefly, it is as follows: Close up all ventilation that now exists in the lamp house, make an opening about 1½ inches wide all the way across the front of the lamp house below the condensers and at the very bottom. Make another opening at the top of the lamp house in the rear, also all the way across, and as much wider than the lower opening as the size of the end of the lid will permit, the idea being that all the air coming in below the condensers will be heated by the arc and pass off to the opening at the rear of the top, thus making a continuous stream of cool air passing in front of the condensers and between them and the arc. Another advantage is that the arc itself is somewhat influenced by the current of air and is carried more directly upward. We find that the crater on the upper carbon sets in place in front of the carbon without any effort on the part of the operator. The reason I made the top opening larger than the bottom is that the air increases in volume as it is heated and needs more room for escape. Before I tried this scheme a new condenser lasted about one minute, and now the trouble is completely eliminated. If this is of any use to others, they are entirely welcome. I returned this week from a visit to your city and I blush with shame for the picture shows I visited while there."

Friend Davidson, it would surprise you to know that almost as many of the letters published are from managers as from operators. In fact, the division is about equal. The managers certainly are not barred, and this is their Department just as much as it is the operators. It is the Trouble Department, intended for the use of anyone who wishes to take advantage of it. Of course, the major part of letters pertain to projection, since better projection is the crying need of the hour. Questions pertaining, however, to the management end of the theater will be just as carefully answered as will projection matters. My own and the thanks of the readers of The Column are due you for setting forth this matter, which I believe myself will be found to be of great value wherever its use is not forbidden by law, which ought to be everywhere: I've blushed some myself for New York City shows.

Up a Stump Again.—Britton, S. D. (C. C. Baker, proprietor and manager) writes as follows. "Why is it that I can secure a better light during my second show. That is to say, why do my carbons give a better light. Until the light has been in operation for at least half an hour I cannot get a satisfactory light."

Friend Baker, you have chased me into the tall timber. I don't know. You will have to be a little more prolific with your data to start with. I don't know whether you use A. C. or D. C.; rheostats or transformers; what kind of carbons, or anything about it. Come on in with some information, old man, and we will see if we cannot solve your difficulty.

A Matter of Law.—Alden, Ia., writes as follows: "Mr Carmichael, proprietor of the Dreamland Theater, Daws. Ia., informs me that a license cannot be imposed on a moving picture theater in towns of less than 4,000, and refers me to you. The Mayor of this town demands a license from me and I have been compelled to pay the same or close my doors, even though I own the building and have lived and paid taxes here for thirty years. Please inform me how to avoid paying license."

Your friend, Mr. Carmichael, is mistaken, I think, Alden. The matter of license is wholly within the province of the municipality, regardless of the population. Possibly if a license of unreasonable amount were demanded you might successfully fight it in court. There may be some clause in the Iowa State law forbidding towns of less than 4,000 to demand license, but I think not. I doubt if such a law would stand the test of the courts. You can, however, ascertain if this be the fact by writing the Attorney General at Des Moines. Demand to see the law or ordinance under the provisions of which the Mayor is acting.

Local Union Makes Salary Agreement.—Scranton, Pa., Operators' Union has made an agreement with the Scranton Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association. The Union has secured an increase in wages from $1 to $3 a week for its members. It has also secured an eight-hour day with overtime, and has a written agreement that none but Union operators will be employed by members of the Exhibitors Association. The agreement becomes effective November 1. Scranton operators are to be congratulated upon their success. We would recommend to them the careful perusal of the letter from President Woods, of the San Francisco Union, printed in this Department two weeks ago.

Double Connection.—W. H. Harmon, McCook, Neb., contributes the following: "I have been a constant reader of the World for more than two years and value it very highly, but have never seen anything from this part of the country. I note the wiring problem from Weatherford, Okla. I have my own direct current plant which has given entire satisfaction for a year and a half. I am also connected with the city A. C. plant and am connected in duplicate all the way through. I have double throw switches and can change any of my lights from one plant to the other instantly. I use a rheostat on D. C. and transformer on A. C. But the change can be made without the picture even turning dim, and I can change all the other lights the same way. I believe that for picture shows in small towns these small light plants are going to prove a success."

We should like to know, Friend Harmon, what kind of a plant you are using. Won't you please describe it to us in detail, giving capacity of engine and dynamo, voltage, etc.? Also how close regulation do you get in the matter of voltage?

White Satin Curtain.—Owosso, Mich., writes as follows: "I am obliged to instal a new curtain and want something good. I have been advised by one exhibitor to put up a white satin curtain. He informed me that it makes a picture stand out clearer than any other screen. Do you know of its being used, and is it a success? Would be very grateful to you for any suggestion you can favor me with in regard to this matter."

No, Owosso, I do not know anything about white satin curtains. I have never seen one, nor ever heard of one being used. I see no reason, however, why it should not make an excellent curtain, though very costly. Personally, I have found a good grade of bleached muslin sheeting 100 inches in width to make a very acceptable curtain. The picture stands out well and the cloth is thin enough that it can be taken down occasionally and laundered with excellent effect. Should you decide to try out the satin curtain, kindly let us know what the result is. I can procure you, merely as a matter of accommodation, the muslin bed-sheeting of which I speak, 100 inches in width, at 75 cents per running yard. I make this offer for the reason that you very likely cannot obtain the wide white muslin in your own city.

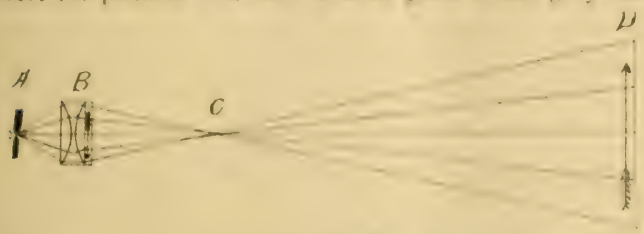
Gas Light.—Mt. Pleasant, Utah, favors us with the following: "In your issue of October 15 you ask for the experience of those having used gaslight. I have used the gaso-oxygen generator and saturator. It is not a cheap light, nor is it a very easy light to handle; but the results obtained are the best of any gas-making outfit I know of. The modus operandi of operating outfit, as practiced by myself, is as follows: Put about 3 pounds of chlorate of potash and black manganese mixed; in an iron retort, about 1½ pints of water in purifier tub, connect pipes to tank and place a small gasoline stove under retort and heat it about five minutes, when the gas will start generating. About 100 pounds of gas will be made, which will be enough to run from two to three hours. When through making gas, disconnect and attach saturator to tank, first putting about a pint of ether in the saturator. It is now ready to use. Use a high power calcium burner with medium bore goose-neck and a 1¼-inch limes. Be very careful in setting your lime that you get it just the right distance from the tip of the goose-neck, as this is the one most important thing necessary in getting good light. The lime should be no more than ⅛ to 3-16 of an inch away from the tip. I have developed 1,200 c. p. using this light and showed an excellent picture, 9 feet high at a distance of 55 feet, using an ordinary screen. The cost of operating this outfit is about $2 per night and it requires an hour's work every day to make the gas. The cost of the outfit itself, however, is, I believe, about $35 without the burner."

We are very much obliged to you, Mt. Pleasant, for the information conveyed. Would be glad to hear from other gas users setting forth in as much detail as possible their practice in the use of gas.

Another One From Crowe.—Watertown, S. D. (A. W. Crowe), is with us again in the following. "In my article in the Trouble Department, October 22, I should not have said that Mr. Pringle, of St. Paul, was wrong, since he could have been right. I enclose a sketch. 'C' in the drawing can be between the condensers and objective (stereo) lens and still project a picture, although with my outfit 'C' has to be about 5 or 6 inches in front of the objective lens; otherwise I do not get a good light. I find if the arc 'A' be moved ½ inch either way it changes 'C' about 4 inches, so I think that the operator would have a hard time keeping 'C' at any given spot during a whole run. As to the lens matter, I will try to make myself more clear. Draw the arc 'A' back from condenser 'B' until 'C' is between condensers and objective (stereo) lens. Place a slide, one half of which is red and the other half blue (I find these colors work the best) in the slide carrier, and the colors will be inverted on the screen. Take the slide out, however, and hold it on the other side of figure 'C' and the colors will not be inverted, which shows that the objective lens does not invert the picture. But here is what gives a man gray hair:



the moving picture lens is a different proposition and is one that inverts the picture on the screen. No matter where 'C' is located, the colors invert themselves when held in front of the aperture plate. To prove that the two lenses haven't the same action, unscrew the lens from the machine and place the colors half way across the back of the lens tube. Open the door of the lamp house, light the arc and reflect the light through the colors and lenses against the wall of the operating room. You will find that the colors with the stereo lens will not be inverted, while those reflected through the moving picture lens will be upside down. With these experiments do not try to get a clear field on the screen, since there is likely to be more or less distortion; but the colors will show whether they are inverted or not."

Well, Neighbor Crowe, there is one thing about your letter I particularly like and that is the gray hair proposition. I am getting a few myself studying this lens business. I would like to put this flea in your ear: If you have a machine with an opening through which you can look and see the back end of your moving picture lens, light your lamp and let the carbons get white hot with the dowser down, meanwhile threading a film into the machine and placing it out of frame about ⅛ of an inch, so that the dividing line between two pictures will show. Pull your switch, open your dowser and look thorugh the back end of your lens. You will see a miniature reproduction of the aperture, about ⅜ to ½ inch wide, and in that reflection will be seen the picture (which is upside down in the aperture) right side up. Chew on that a while, Neighbor Crowe, and see what you get out of it. It was handed to me in an excellent letter two or three days ago. I am just now engaged in making some experiments in the matter of light rays and shall have something to say myself before long.

Woke Him Up.—Woodhaven, L. I., contributes the following: "I wish to convey to you my heartfelt thanks for 'waking me up' through the Trouble Department of the Moving Picture World. I was for a long while a very indifferent 'grinder,' principally because of the hosts of low-browes who keep salaries in New York City too low for serious consideration. I could do better in regular theatrical work. Now that these near-operators are being weeded out, there is some stimulus to making a serious study of projection, and I am now trying to do that, putting all there is in me into an effort to be as good an operator as there is anywhere, and I intend to succeed. This is not egotism, but determination. Will you kindly answer for me the following queries:

"1. What could be done if one arrived at the hall or church intent upon giving a show and found the transformer outside the building of insufficient capacity to carry the increased load of his arc lamp?

"2. What would you do if the meter was too small, the transformer being of sufficient capacity?

"3. What if both are too small?

"4. In cleaning a Power's No. 5 with kerosene oil, isn't the kerosene liable to carry grit into the different shaft bearings through the oil holes? Must the whole machine be taken apart to be cleaned with kerosene?

"In closing, allow me to thank you for arousing ambition in me to become a real operator."

It is such letters as this that give one encouragement and proof that the efforts of the past year have not been altogether wasted. I have rubbed it into operators pretty strong, but there has been a method in my madness. My whole design has been to do just what I have done with Friend Woodhaven,—wake them up and jar operators out of the rut into which so many have fallen.

As regards your questions: If the line transformer is large enough to carry your current without anything else on, I would try to arrange to have all other lights extinguished during the time the arc is burning, remembering always that the commercial transformer will stand a very heavy overload for an hour or two without material injury. If, however, the transformer is too small and cannot be made to carry your lamp, there is nothing to do but have a heavier instrument installed, since you cannot attach your lamp to the high tension wires, nor would it be practical to use resistance.

2. If the meter were too small I would call up the light company and arrange to pay a flat rate and connect on to the lines ahead of the meter.

3. I think this is answered by 1 and 2.

4. The best way to clean a Power's No. 5, or any other machine, is to immerse it in gasoline, turn the crank a dozen times or so and take it out. Afterwards flood the bearings with oil, then wipe the whole mechanism clean.

ELECTRIC SIGNS FOR MOVING PICTURE THEATERS.

Necessary parts of the equipment of the modern and up-to-date moving picture theater are those which rely upon illuminated signs for their effect and operation. The external signs of the house, for example, not to mention those used in the interior. Then there are the spot lights, foot lights and everything pertaining to stage lighting effects. Conductors of American amusement houses, such as theaters, concert halls, and the like, always pay particular attention to these matters. Indeed, in the matter of external illumination the American theater man is always pre-eminent. And the moving picture man is, or at any rate should be, not behind other men in the entertainment business. In the interests of exhibitors and moving picture theater managers, we draw special attention to the fact that the Globe Electric Sign and Specialty Company, of West Forty-second street, New York City, pays special attention to this class of work. They furnish all the supplies; they draw up estimates; they make original designs; in fact, they are prepared to give a moving picture theater exhibitor or manager everything that he requires in the way of illumination for advertising or equipping his house. We recommend our readers therefore to get into touch with this company, feeling assured, as we do, from personal knowledge of the Globe people, that their requirements will be met in a prompt, efficient and satisfactory manner.

"HALLBERG" EQUIPS DORCHESTER THEATER.

W. R. Lusher, proprietor of the New Dorchester Theater, Flatbush, Brooklyn, placed an order last week with J. H. Hallberg, 36 East Twenty-third street, for an entire moving picture equipment, including two Motiograph moving picture machines, two "Hallberg" Economizers, two 4000 c. p. flaming arc lamps and a new electric sign, which Mr. Hallberg has just imported from England. This sign saves two-thirds on the electric bill, and can be read at a longer distance and at a sharper angle than any other sign ever produced.

Mr. Lusher saw the Motiograph in operation last year in Earl's Court, London, England, and he was so favorably impressed that he would not consider any machine but the Motiograph for his new Dorchester Theater. The ventilation of the theater will be accomplished by two "Hallberg" 24-inch exhaust fans, fitted with speed controllers and reversing switches, so as to act as either exhaust or pressure fans. The Kleine Optical Company of New York will furnish the films.

The Niagara Slide Company, of Lockport, N. Y., have just issued a neat four-page catalogue giving a partial list of their announcement and miscellaneous slides. A number of the slides in their list should be included in the slide stock of every moving picture theater. They are also makers of advertising and special slides which can be made profitable and interesting additions to any program.

THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF THE STATE OF OHIO.

By President M. A. Neff.

On October 3d at the Chittenden Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, the Exhibitors' League of the State of Ohio was organized. There had been previous efforts made to organize a League, of the motion picture people, but up to the present time it had lacked the support to make it a strong, effective organization. The Ohio exhibitors realize the fact that to raise the standard of our business and to secure our rights, it becomes absolutely necessary to have a thorough organization. The organization is not formed for the purpose of fighting anybody, or any special thing, but on the contrary is for the purpose of assisting the moving picture exhibitors in securing their rights, in all things pertaining to their business. The laws of the State are so construed as to work hardships upon the moving picture people. We propose to look after our own interests and see that just and eligible laws are passed in the Legislature for our protection as well as the protection of other lines of business.

We are discriminated against in many ways. Our insurance rates are double what they should be. We have a state inspector, and a city inspector, and an insurance inspector to inspect each and every moving picture theater. The safeguards thrown around the moving picture theaters make it the safest and best risk that an insurance company could possibly take. There has never been a fire to my knowledge or the explosion of a film in a moving picture booth, that has done damage to any extent. It is almost impossible to have a fire where an experienced operator is in charge. Our booths are all lined and made fireproof. Of course, there have been a few fires in moving picture theaters, but it comes from the crossing of wires, and not films. The only large fire we have had has not been in the picture shows, but in the theater where an inexperienced operator was at work, or in some large film exchange. Consequently, taking into consideration all the facts as they are, the moving picture show is one of the safest risks to take by an insurance company. The express companies are overcharging us.

Some of the inexperienced picture men allow their machines to be running in bad condition, thus tearing films, and creating a condition that the men who have competent operators, and look after their business have to pay for. Our organization is for the purpose of educating all picture show men along the lines of taking care of films, etc., and this information can only be gained through organization, as many men do not take your valuable paper and, of course, are not posted in regard to many things that they should be. Every exhibitor in the United States should read the Moving Picture World, because it gives both sides of the question, and information that will help everybody in the business. We stand for progress and a square deal with everybody. It is the duty of every film exchange and manufacturer in the United States to assist in organizing a thorough League. It will weed out the undesirable and create a healthy condition, and every just debt will be paid promptly by every member of our League, and every member of our League is posted and knows how to run his business, and by reason of this fact, it is a great assistance to the manufacturers, and to the film exchanges. No man can be a member of our League and beat anyone.

One of the main principles of our League, is that a man must be in good standing, honest and a straightforward business man, or he cannot become a member. His application has to be passed upon, before a membership card is issued to him. We are growing very rapidly, and by the fifth day of December, when we meet at Columbus, Ohio, again, we will have a very large membership. We have taken over all of the old organization, that have heretofore endeavored to organize. We are organized upon a business basis, and we are not going to win, but have already won. We are strong enough right now to command attention, and to ask for what we want, without fear or favor.

M. A. NEFF.
President of the Exhibitors' Association of Ohio.

CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS OF THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE.

OFFICERS.

M. A. NEFF, President, Cincinnati, Ohio.
W. A. PITTIS, Vice-President, Conneaut, Ohio.
T. P. REICHERT, Second Vice-President, Port Clinton, Ohio.
G. O. DUPUIS, Treasurer, Lima, Ohio.
C. C. CARTER, Secretary, Cincinnati, Ohio.

ARTICLE I.

Section 1. The name of this League shall be "The Exhibitors' League."

ARTICLE II.

Section 1. The object of this League is to promote and protect the welfare of the moving picture theaters and of the persons engaged therein, within the United States, and especially within the State of Ohio. To provide opportunity for an exchange of ideas, to further, legally and legitimately, the best interests of all the members thereof, in all matters pertaining to the exhibitors' business. To use our influence to induce the manufacturers not to produce pictures that might be termed objectionable. It is not the purpose of this League to take sides with the Independent or Patents Company, manufacturers or film renters, only so far as it affects the welfare of the entire organization.

ARTICLE III.

Section 1. The officers of this League shall be a President, Vice-President, Second Vice-President, Treasurer and Secretary. The governing body shall be known as a Board of Directors, consisting of the five officers elected at the annual meeting, who are to hold office until their successors shall be elected and qualified.

ARTICLE IV.

Section 1. The President shall preside at all meetings of the League. He shall call a special meeting upon the request of a quorum of members of the Board of Directors, or when he deems special meetings necessary. He shall strictly enforce the rules of the League and shall investigate any refringement of the same.

Section 2. The Secretary shall keep a record of all meetings of the League.

Section 3. In the absence of the President the Vice-President shall assume and perform all the duties of that office.

Section 4. In the absence of both the President and Vice-President the Second Vice-President shall assume and perform all the duties of that office.

Section 5. The Treasurer shall have charge of all funds of the League, and upon order of the President and one of the Board, he shall make such expenditure of same as are necessary. He shall keep a record of same, and shall report at each quarterly meeting and such other times as requested. The Treasurer will be required to furnish a bond of his duties, same to be approved by the Board of Directors.

Section 6. All money belonging to the Exhibitors' League shall be deposited in the name of The Exhibitors' League by the Treasurer, and all checks shall be signed by the Treasurer and President.

Section 7. The Board of Directors shall be the sovereign body of this organization when in session.

ARTICLE V.

Section 1. There shall be an annual meeting held at such time and place as the Directors of this League think best. A written notice to be mailed to each and every member at least five days before the meeting takes place.

Section 2. In case of a vacancy in any office before the annual meeting by reason of death, resignation or other cause, the vacancy shall be filled by vote of the Board of Directors.

ARTICLE VI.

Section 1. All bona fide, responsible motion picture exhibitors may become members of this League upon application with the proper fee, and receiving a majority vote of the Board of Directors.

BY-LAWS—

ARTICLE I.

Section 1. The Board of Directors shall meet quarterly each year, said meetings to be held the first Monday in January, April, July and October, hours and place of meeting to be designated by the President. All members of the League are eligible to attend these meetings. Meetings to be held at Columbus unless members are otherwise notified.

Section 2. Notice of such meeting, time and place must be sent to each member at least ten days before said time. The Secretary shall be responsible for this notice.

Section 3. A majority of the Board of Directors shall constitue a quorum.

ARTICLE II.

Section 1. The initiation fee shall be the sum of five dollars, until December 3, 1910, payable at the time of making application for membership, and shall be refunded if the applicant is not elected.

ARTICLE III.

Section 1. It is the duty of each and every member to notify the President of any invention, picture, or anything else that would be of benefit to the members of the organization to know, and it is the duty of the President to so notify all the members of anything pertaining to the moving picture business that will benefit the members.

Section 2. It is hereby made the duty of any and every member of this League who has knowledge or information of unfair or dishonest methods practiced by any other member in the conduct of his business or any infraction of the Constitution and By-Laws of this League, promptly to notify the President, whose duty it will be to notify, in writing each member of the Board of Directors within five days after having received such notice. The Directors thereupon shall investigate such charges, and if found to be untrue, said member shall be expelled from this League.

ARTICLE IV.

Section 1. Any proposed amendment to the Constitution shall be handed to the President not less than twenty days before the meeting, at which time it is to be acted upon, a copy of which shall be mailed to each member. Such proposed amendment may then be acted upon at the next regular meeting and passed on a two-thirds majority vote.

ARTICLE V.

Section 1. Minutes of meeting of the Exhibitors' League held at the Chittenden Hotel, in the city of Columbus, State of Ohio, October 3, 1910. Meeting was called to order by temporary President M. A. Neff on October 3 at 2 p. m. The minutes of the previous meeting were read by the temporary Secretary, Mr. C. C. Carter. After a lengthy discussion as to the needs of the Exhibitors' League, it was unanimously decided to form a permanent organization.

ARTICLE VI.

Section 1. M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, was nominated for the office of President and was elected without a dissenting vote. W. A. Pittis, of Conneaut, was elected Vice President. P. F. Reichert, of Port Clinton, was elected Second Vice President. G. O. Dupuis, of Lima, was elected Treasurer. C. C. Carter, of Cincinnati, was elected temporary Secretary.

ARTICLE VII.

Section 1. A motion was made and carried that the initiation fee be $5.00 for sixty days, and after that $10.00. Motion was made and seconded that the Board of Directors meet in the evening and adopt a Constitution and By-Laws, and motion carried. Motion was made and seconded that meeting be adjourned to meet on Monday, December 5, 1910. Motion was made and seconded that the meeting be adjourned. Motion carried.

DINNER TO ARTHUR "VIC" SMITH OF THE VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

On Saturday evening, October 29, a testimonial dinner was tendered to Arthur "Vic" Smith, the cashier of the Vitagraph Company of America, at Raub's Garret, corner Nevins and Fulton streets, Brooklyn, by the professional and manufacturing departments. Among the invited guests were William T. Rock, president; J. Stuart Blackton, ivce-president and secretary, and Albert E. Smith, treasurer and business manager of the Vitagraph Company, and a few other chosen friends. The tables were arranged in the form of the letter V, decorated with flowers and especially designed favors. A very elaborate menu was served by a corps of waiters dressed in Louis XIV. costumes and wigs, while an orchestra discoursed appetizing music. J. Stuart Blackton acted as toastmaster, who called upon Messrs. Rock, Smith and others to say their say and they had no trouble in saying it.

HE'S SADDER BUT WISER MAN.

Louis Landsman had theatrical ambitions lately. Seeing a "want ad" in which a partner for a moving picture show was wanted, he decided to break into the game via the picture route.

Accompanied by his wife he called at the address given, a hotel on lower Hennepin, and found an affable stranger who held forth on the joys of life on the road. His show was at present in Seattle, Wash., but was coming this way. Mr. Landsman could become a partner and share in the harvest of profits. In order to become a full fledged partner Mr. Landsman was requested to buy a film for the show. Accompanied by the showman he was taken to a room and there persuaded to pay $150 for a film having as its subject a gold brick game. He took the film home and began to figure up his profits for a week's time. But for some reason the showman has not been seen since and Mr. Landsman found his film was valued at $4. He appealed to the police.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Mr. Stelter, the secretary of the Revier Motion Picture Company, of Salt Lake City, Utah, called upon us this week on his way to a Sales Company meeting. From him we learned very many interesting things with regard to the picture outlook in the great Mormon State, which we shall probably embody in a future article.

We had the pleasure this week of a visit from Dr. Marcel Vandal, the managing director of the Eclair Company of Paris. We shall shortly publish a description of the Eclair French works. Meanwhile, we may state that it is the intention of the company instantly to erect a moving picture plant at the Palisades, N. J., for the production of Eclair pictures in this country having all the famous Eclair quality. The first Eclair American release will be announced in due course.

WESTERN FILM DRAWING BIG IN CHICAGO.

We understand the Cowboy and Indian Frontier Celebration picture opened a week ago in Montreal to "big business." The Ontario Film Exchange, of Windsor, Ontario, have purchased the entire Canadian rights for this film and are now busy arranging dates. Judging from the opening business in Montreal, they believe that this film will prove a feature reel and an exceedingly popular drawing card throughout the entire Dominion.

"BISON" COMPANY LOST.

Our Los Angeles correspondent sends us a clipping from the Los Angeles Examiner telling of searching parties being organized to hunt for Fred J. Balshofer, manager, and three others of the Bison Company, who have not been heard from for four days. They left Los Angeles in an automobile for a camp twenty-seven miles away and the report is that their machine lies a wreck in a mountain gully. A note pinned to a tree by the roadside says they are footing it, and they ask for the relief party with mules.

"The Passing of a Grouch" (Biograph).—Whether or not a grouch is transmitted from one to another, as shown in this picture, remains for the pschycologist to determine. Here, at any rate, it passes on, relieving one person while it affects another, until it gets back at night through his wife to the man who started it on its travels in the morning. The picture has much of interesting suggestion in it and offers explanations of personal peculiarities which have previously seemed incomprehensible.

"The Proposal" (Biograph).—A comedy which seems to indicate that it is wiser to make proposals verbally and then they can be recalled if desired. This gentleman got a scare after he posted his letter, but he could neither recover nor intercept it and was on the point of committing suicide, or flying to parts unknown when the letter comes back, returned for better address. This means that he is saved from the results of his folly and it seems a safe conclusion that he will not make any further experiments in this direction. A live comedy, full of laughs.

"False Love and True" (Lubin).—A new rendering of an old story. Men have deceived women numerous times and after marrying them have taken them to homes of luxury, but in this instance a girl tries the experiment and apparently succeeds to her entire satisfaction.

"Edith's Avoirdupois" (Lubin).—Of course the Lubin producers saw the opportunity for a delightful comedy in the fashionable ban on flesh and a comedy has been produced which keeps the audience in good humor throughout its short length.

"Under the Stars and Bars" (Melies).—This story of a Confederate soldier does not differ materially from what might have happened to any soldier. He returned after the war to find his home deserted, just as many another Confederate did, and wandered to a part where by accident he found again his wife and daughter, and the picture ends with the happy reunion. There is a scene which illustrates the fall of Vicksburg that is quite realistic enough to suit the most exacting, and there are other scenes which deal with some of the horrors of war. Such pictures help to bring about the reign of universal peace.

"Blasted Hopes" (Selig).—A love story representing a country girl deceived by a city man in quite the usual way and deserted in quite the usual way. He forgets her and marries another and when she seeks him and discovers the truth she falls insensible, heartbroken by his heartless action.

"The Swiss Guard" (Edison).—A love story told in that region of grandeur and beauty, the Canadian Rockies. It is a complicated love story, well told, and sympathetically acted, though one may venture the opinion that with all its merits it will scarcely attract more attention than the scenery. The artistic service performed by this company in this direction is by no means slight. To be able to produce hundreds of miles distant such accurate representations of mountain scenery is an achievement of which any firm may be proud.

"Indian Pete's Gratitude" (Kalem).—An Indian picture depicting the well known Indian characteristic of gratitude for a kindness done. In this the half breed, befriended by some white people, gives up his life in an effort to assist them in maintaining their ownership of a mine. His efforts are successful, but he receives a mortal wound, living only long enough to know he has done what he tried to do. The picture is melodramatic and has a number of thrilling scenes.

"Max in the Alps" (Pathe).—A comedy presenting Max in a new role, trying to secure an edelweiss blossom for the fair one. His experiences in the snow drift are amusing to everyone but himself, and when he takes his final tumble there is tumultuous laughter.

"Buffalo Fight" (Pathe).—A colored topical picture, photographed and reproduced with all the skill for which the Pathes are noted. It is quite in keeping with all their work of a similar character.

"Capt. Barnacle's Chaperone" (Vitagraph).—A comedy full of life and sparkle, showing how lovers outwit such adverse influences as sour visaged chaperones and succeed in their purposes, regardless of the complicated snares set for their unwary feet. Of course the question of whether it was quite square for the lover to so cruelly deceive a chaperone as to make her think he is going to elope with her, and then run away with the girl.

"The Silent Message" (Essanay).—A Western drama with a ruffian making advances to a girl who by reason of being alone is temporarily in his power. But here enters an episode so different from anything which has been seen in these Western pictures that it makes the film of unusual interest. The girl backs up to a window and by means of the sign language instructs the deaf and dumb Indian girl to ride for help, which she does and the outlaw is apprehended.

"Life of Moliere" (Gaumont).—A sumptuous production, ranking high with the films of the week and presenting features of staging which are remarkable for their beauty and the truthfulness of their reproduction. It is a task well nigh appalling to reproduce any such sumptuous scenes as were common in the court of Louis XIV.; but in this film a variety of court views are shown which are, apparently, truthful reproductions, convincing in their beauty, of the life of Moliere, the greatest playwright excepting Shakespeare the world his ever known.

"The Indian and the Maid" (Pathe).—A film presenting some exciting Western scenes. The fall of a girl over a cliff and her rescue by an Indian who lets himself down by a rope is thrilling enough. To see a girl carried down by a rushing stream, pulled out by this Indian, who with difficulty carries her to the top of the cliff and gets her to the ranch where she is speedily revived. Later a love scene is introduced, with the same Indian, now an educated young man, a figure.

"The Telephone" (Vitagraph).—An interesting picture representing the practical utility of the telephone in reporting the peril of a mother and child in a burning house. By means of this valuable agency they were released in time and rescued. Bringing them down the ladders through the blinding smoke is a thrilling scene, but one that is often duplicated by firemen everywhere.

"A Day on the French Battleship Justice" (Vitagraph).—A series of views reproducing life on a French battleship, giving a good idea of what the sailors do in work and play.

"Two Little Waifs" (Biograph).—Perhaps this picture will exert some influence upon those who might easily care for a lonely waif. If it does, its work will be a distinct advantage to humanity. If it softens even one heart it will be helpful. Perhaps it might be said that the most impressive lesson it teaches is that there is a home waiting somewhere for each waif where love and sympathy reign, only the little unfortunates fail in most instances to find it.

"Brothers" (Lubin).—A story of self sacrifice on the part of one brother to save another from the consequences of his evil ways. A pretty love story is interwoven with it, and after numerous disturbing vicissitudes the wayward brother reforms. The part of the girl is well and vigorously played in this film, and she is one with whom almost any man would fall in love.

"Max Has Trouble With His Eyes" (Pathe).—A comedy centering around the unforunate Max whose difficulties are apparently never ending. This time he can't see, and the result is a series of blunders, culminating in the kissing of the wrong lady which brings on a duel. A duel is commonplace, but Max manages to introduce some novelties, by reason of his bad eyes, which mark this one as perhaps the most humorously remarkable on record.

"New Style Inkwell" (Pathe).—Intended to be a humorous film, but there is little really funny in squirting ink into person's faces and ruining their clothes.

"Darjiling" (Pathe).—A satisfactory and informing picture of this town in Northern India which because of its location is visited as a Summer resort by a large number of people. The appearance of the town, the people in the streets, the modes of conveyance and the surrounding scenery are faithfully reproduced.

BANK FLOOR, ASHLAND BLOCK : : CHICAGO, ILLS.

Sold only through the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company.

"Settled Out of Court" (Selig).—A salutary lesson upon the results of jealousy which might, and often does, result in misunderstanding, then separation. Perhaps it is unnecessary to repeat the story. They are all much alike and in a majority of instances are due to unreasoning misunderstanding followed by failure to accept explanations.

"The Key of Life" (Edison).—A comedy dealing with the strange Hindu belief or reincarnation. Much interest attaches to the staging which presents scenes of an Oriental character of more than passing interest. The climax is reached when the young man, through the use of the charms left him by the dying priest, succeeds in changing a cat into a young woman.

"Fortunate Misfortune" (Essanay).—A double love story based upon the fact that one girl discarded a young man because he was ruined by business reverses. Later he finds a girl who wants him, not his money, and then he discovers that some hitherto worthless stocks have suddenly increased in value until he is wealthy again. Difficult to describe, this picture is interesting when seen on the screen.

"Both Were Stung" (Gaumont).—A love comedy, depicting the chagrin of two young fellows who both fell in love with the same girl, but who spent so much time in their makeup that a third man carried away the prize. The comedy lies in the careful preparations of the two young men and their dual attempts to please the young woman; and then the climax when she gives her affections elsewhere. A simple comedy, but—amusing.

"Picturesque Majorca in the Mediterranean" (Gaumont).—An interesting trip through this island, the largest of the Bilearic group, showing everything worth while. The operator did his work with discretion and the mechanical department was equally careful in attending to its own share. The result is a picture which will appeal to everyone who loves the scenic beauty of the great outdoors.

"A Double Elopement" (Vitagraph).—Two ardent young couples. Four objecting parents. Two elopements planned. A mixup in the girls and four parents pursuing the couples. The mixup in girls is straightened out. The ceremonies are performed. The objecting parents give their blessing and eight people go home happy.

"Boy Scouts of America" (Edison).—A graphic illustration which answers many questions asked regarding this popular and growing organization. Having its origin in England, it was championed in this country by Ernest Thompson-Seton, and is valuable chiefly because it teaches love for the great outdoors.

"Riders of the Plains" (Edison).—An excellent illustration of the actual work done by the mounted police of Canada, the most perfect body of mounted men in the world. The story represents how they capture an Indian thief, and while it is not particularly sensational, it will be found to be interesting. Moreover, the work is done by real officers and real Indians in the country where they do their work daily.

"The Rough Rider's Romance" (Kalem).—A melodramatic love story based upon a famous cavalry battle in the late Spanish war. The love story which is interwoven with it to give some interest to a dull picture doesn't end as most love stories do, but perhaps is none the less interesting for that reason.

"Cowboy Justice" (Pathe).—A sensational subject produced by the American company representing this house. The usual Western conception is seen, though it will be admitted that considerable care and effort mark this subject, as compared with some of those previously produced by the same company. The introduction of an automobile to aid the outlaws in escaping seems ridiculously out of place.

"Facori Family" (Pathe).—A reproduction of acrobatic work which seems almost impossible. The photography is remarkably good, considering the character of the subject. As one act after another is performed, one is almost disposed to hold one's breath, even though it is only a picture.

"Tragical Concealment" (Urban-Eclipse).—A thrilling story of France, representing a marquis hidden from searching soldiers behind a secret panel in the wall. Then the unfortunate wife is carried away by the soldiers and goes mad in prison thinking of her husband suffocating behind the closed door. Her reason is restored by re-enacting the scene before her. As she sees her husband step forth from his hiding-place her unbalanced mind is restored to its normal condition. The interest is in this psychological feature rather than any of the pictorial or dramatic qualities.

"Crossing the Andes" (Urban-Eclipse).—A picture of scenery in the Andes, showing the methods of transportation by mules. One little touch is significant of the whole picture. The road is so difficult that most of the mules are lame. Some of the scenic features represent faithfully the grandeur of the mountains and their wonders. Like all the outdoor work of this house, this picture interprets the mountains with unusual fidelity and makes one feel that one is really among them.

INDEPENDENT.

"Who Is She?" (Great Northern).—A drama similar to "Madame X," which has had a favorable run in New York and other cities during the past year or two. It can be said for this film, however, that the people responsible for its production have eliminated much that is not required and have kept the salient features, emphasizing them in a way that makes them stand out clearer and makes the play far more real. The acting is done with sympathy and skill, while the mechanical work is up to the usual standard of the Great Northern people. There is more than mere amusement in this picture. There is a reproduction of dramatic work that is well worth seeing.

"An Excursion on the Lake of Garda" (Itala).—An outdoor picture from this house which has not heretofore given the public much of such work. In this instance the operator selected his viewpoints with care, in most instances interpreting a mood of nature that is quite comprehensible to anyone who sees the picture. In others improvement might be possible, but in the main there is little criticism for the work. As a welcome diversion from the dramas and comedies such pictures as this are welcome, provided only they are well done and the photographic work is clear.

"Foolshead Volunteer of the Red Cross" (Itala).—That the Red Cross should be made the subject of a semi-humorous film does not seem right. Of course Foolshead is a comedian of merit, but there are some things which are better acted by those whose roles are serious. There are some things, too, which cannot be travestied and the Red Cross is one of these. Under no consideration would it be in order to make fun of such an organization as the Red Cross. Like the work of all organizations there will be humorous features. That would be only human; but they are incidental and foster no false impressions. It would be better that somebody besides comedians volunteer to the Red Cross work.

"A Clause in the Will" (Defender).—This story might seem absurd; only a few days ago something exactly like it occurred in real life up to the point where the man decides to brace up and become worthy of the woman who weds him to procure her fortune. The newspapers told the story with a good deal of detail. Later they said that the man took his money with him to some place or other and colored women stole it all. In the picture the thing runs differently, and, withal, rather more satisfactorily. The young man weds the girl because she paid him for it, then takes his money and disappears. Later the two come together again. He recognizes her, but she does not remember him. They fall in love all over again and presumably live happily every afterward. To have the story of a film reproduced in real life before the film is shown on the screen is not the lot of every producer, but in this instance it was done. It should make the film all the more popular.

"Mendelssohn's Spring Song" (Imp).—A story of how a musician might have composed a masterpiece, receiving his inspiration for different parts from persons and actions along the way. It humorously represents the possibilities of such compositions, but it may well be considered as unlikely that any composer ever performed his work in this way. However, the film shows a long string of people and things following after the composer as he plays the composition on the violin. The things which inspire him are quite commonplace and are, for that matter, rather more humorous than they would be otherwise. There is plenty of life and action and at the close, as they all unite in singing the new composition, the variety of facial expression is remarkable.

"The Hobble Skirt" (Imp).—This picture is illustrative of the difficulty into which a tramp got himself by donning a hobble skirt and impersonating an actress. The crowd was satisfied until the actress appeared, then the trouble began for the counterfeit. He ran and they all after him and before they finish with him he is quite ready to admit that he has had quite sufficient punishment to last him indefinitely. The humorous element is increased by the introduction of a long chase with the usual variety of mishaps included.

"Bewitched" (Lux).—The tale of what happened to a gentleman's hat which was utilized by a magician in performing his tricks. Apparently he didn't take out all the animals it contained because they appeared to the unfortunate owner at extremely inconvenient places shortly afterward.

The humor lies in the unexpected character of the appearances of the animals.

"She Required Strength and Got It" (Lux).—Moral: Take a bottle of Lux strength renewer. The old lady who drank it was able to do wonderful stunts with her barrow, overturning everything in her way and finally breaking in the wall of a house, she attacked it with so much vigor. There is plenty of life and unexpected difficulties. The film keeps the audience laughing heartily at the absurd things the old lady does with her barrow.

"Where You Go I Go" (Lux).—A humorous skit illustrating the difficulties which arose between two partners, one of whom was determined to follow the other. The nosy individual was somewhat corpulent and the difficulties into which he succeeded in getting entangled were laughable and are a fitting close to a reel that has three good comedies on it. This reel deserves more than passing notice since the producers have shunned the error which producers sometimes make—they have not made their comedies too long. On the contrary they have made them short and snappy and have thus been able to make them really funny. The reel will be greatly appreciated by managers who realize that an audience will not stand for the average long comedy, but likes two or three short, lively ones.

"Tontilini is in Love" (Cines).—Perhaps this film can be pointed to as an example of what a young man will do when he is in love. At any rate, the ever delightful Tontilini gives an exhibition that should serve as a warning to those who are liable to commit similar indiscretions. Even though he had a place near his lady, he spoiled all his chances by becoming excited and turning the hose on the crowd, including his lady, when a fire breaks out. As may be supposed all his chances for obtaining her favor vanish with this exploit.

"The Pretty Dairymaid" (Cines).—A love story in which a poor shepherd and a lord become enamoured of a dairymaid. Well, there are some, perhaps, who would perform this interesting operation, but whether this one would or not the audience may judge. Eventually, however, the maid relents and returns to her poor lover, while the lord becomes exceedingly gracious and takes the couple under his protection. It is, perhaps, a reasonably good exemplification of this type of story and this type of acting, but the average person will not be likely to discover anything remarkable in its production.

"The Sergeant's Daughter" (Solax).—A story of love and war in the Philippines. The opening scene is attractive, showing the movement of numberless soldiers upon a ship bound for the war. The scenes in the Philippines are interesting, reproducing the characteristic features with much fidelity to the original and affording opportunity to become acquainted with some of the principal features of those marvelous islands. Through it runs a love story which adds the requisite heart interest and assists in holding the attention of the audience. The film is good, the technical work upon it being satisfactory, while the acting is quite in harmony with the subject.

"The Fairies' Hallowe'en" (Thanhouser).—A story that will interest the children and all those grown people who have not forgotten their childhood days and the pleasures they had with Hallowe'en games and the fairy stories which are essential features of every child's life. To see the doll and the pumpkin suddenly assume life is interesting and naturally causes the little girl to whom they belong surprise. The good times they have as the fairies help will long remain in her memory, even though it is only a dream. That dream, translated into the motion picture film, will serve also to interest many thousands of others. The first little girl might have been disappointed when she found she had been dreaming, but those who see the picture will not be disappointed, they are let into the secret soon enough to prevent that.

"The Manufacture of Roquefort Cheese" (Eclair).—An industrial film which represents first the district where the cheese is made and the huge flocks of goats scattered over the pastures. Milking time is illustrated, with the goats being milked. Following this is a representation of the full process of cheese making, even to placing the ripened cheeses on the wagons ready for shipment. Probably everyone likes Roquefort cheese and this picture will prove interesting since it conveys information regarding its manufacture.

"Little Mother" (Eclair).—A pathetic story with a happy ending. It will influence people to be more helpful to those in distress and more ready to relieve suffering. The little girl's kindness to the unfortunate child is later extended to include the mother also, a pleasant ending for all parties concerned. Charity of this sort is very practical and very beneficial and the influence should be far reaching.

"The Idol's Eye" (Imp).—This story reminds one strongly of the "Moonstone" and Stevenson has a story in his "New Arabian Nights" which has some features similar to it. The main point to be brought out is the essentially injurious influence apparently inseparably connected with the stone. This the producer did not make sufficiently clear and a few subtitles would have helped. The dramatic situations are numerous, but not altogether pleasant, though this does not hinder one admiring the strength and power of the story. Around it all is thrown some of the glamor of Eastern mysticism in the peculiar poison and its antidote. The acting is admirable and the staging is quite satisfactory.

"The Italian Sherlock Holmes" (Yankee).—One of those melodramatic detective stories, full of the average impossibilities of all detective stories, yet possessing a fascination from which it is impossible to escape. Here is a valuable necklace stolen and the detective really runs down the thief because he had a bit of dust on his arm. Of course many deductions are drawn from apparently insignificant sources, but the main proposition is that the detective brings the thieves to justice and recovers the stolen property. Then he walks away scorning the money offered him in payment for his services. It is all performed so well that one cannot help but follow it with growing interest until the end. Detective stories are quite as interesting on the films as they are in books.

"The Fatal Gold" (Bison).—A drama in the Bison style, melodramatic in its character and abounding in situations, some of which scarcely bear the semblance of reality.

"The Sheriff and Miss Jones" (Powers).—A Western picture with some gun play, and the sheriff not only assisting in the escape of the man he was seeking, but actually making love to him, so excellent is his disguise. Perhaps it is quite in keeping with the principles of romance to wink at this violation of the probabilities and admit that a man could be so carefully disguised as a woman as to deceive even an officer; but in the vernacular it sounds fishy, and in some degree spoils the picture. To deceive the sheriff for a time would be sufficient. To deceive him as a joke would be quite satisfactory, but to deceive him seriously and secure his aid in escaping is a matter which passes the bounds of reason, and, from certain standpoints, mars the picture. If it was intended as a joke, as the closing scenes would seem to indicate, it is equally open to criticism, since the sheriff supposed the person he was seeking was guilty of a probable murder. Apparently this view of the situation is untenable. It becomes necessary, therefore, to accept it as it is and question the truthfulness of the narrative in that one particular. Otherwise the picture is no better or worse than a majority of those dealing with Western affairs.

"Mental Science" (Powers).—A comedy purporting to represent the marvelous things a man does after studying mental science for a time. All things come his way and he accomplishes so many difficult things that he acquires a sort of fame. When his wife goes home to her mother he exercises his peculiar talents and she trots obediently back. And so it goes. Truly a knowledge of mental science was a valuable asset in this gentleman's case.

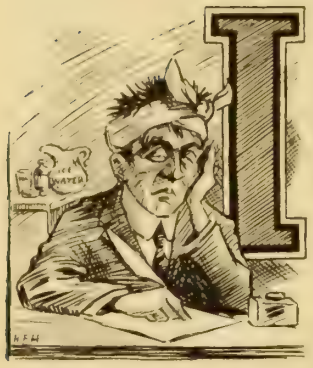
"Mistress and Maid" (Thanhouser).—A film detailing the woes of an heiress who to escape the conventionalities with which her position surrounds her, changes places with her maid and falls in love with a life guard in the most approved romantic style. She gets imprisoned in a light house through the maid's machinations, but an intelligent dog takes a long swim and delivers a note to her lover. Then follows a romantic rescue and the apprehension of the rascally maid, with the musical chimes of the wedding bells ringing in the near distance. There is life and animation enough to suit the most exacting, with good acting and clear photography as features of the picture.

"The Turning of the Worm" (Atlas).—Sometimes big, brutal husbands discover to their entire discomfiture that their hitherto yielding and pliant wives have spirit, and when they do there is usually some disagreeable feature connected with the discovery. The instance here depicted is one of those, and the fact that the big husband finally reaches his just deserts is looked upon with amusement by the audience. Well, perhaps it may be, for the surprise is so altogether sudden and the circumstances are so unusual for the man that he clearly shows his surprise. From that day forth conditions change in that home and the wife is restored to her rightful place as the equal partner in the household affairs.

Meeting of the Independents at Cleveland.

By John M. Bradlet and H. F. Hoffman.

(Sketches by H. F. Hoffman.)



IT happened in Cleveland, which is rather a strange thing, for nothing much has happened in Cleveland since John D. made his debut there in the early sixties.

The comatose town by Lake Erie was awakened from its Rip Van Winkle sleep on October 28 and 29, with the coming of the N. I. M. P. A., which means the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance. From the four points of the compass these gentlemen had foregathered to tell each other that things are not altogether as they ought to be in the Independent film renting business.

By a very odd coincidence it appears also that certain and divers Independent film manufacturers were also in Cleveland on business at the same time. By the merest chance, of course; sort of accidental like.

It was gratifying to note the friendly manner with which these two factions greeted each other. They flocked together like birds of a feather, exactly as they should have done. To the innocent bystander there appeared to be only harmony, but we must not forget the old adage: "There's many a smiling face that hides an aching heart."

The early arrivals spent Friday night "Seeing Cleveland" on a personally conducted expedition, which will probably be duly released as a film subject entitled, "The Slums of Cleveland."

The main bunch arrived on the firing line Saturday morning ready for business. The meeting was scheduled for 2 p. m., but, for the especial accommodation of those who wanted to get away early, it was postponed until nearly train time. According to the custom of all film conventions, the day was spent in hob-nobbing around the hotel corridor. There seems to be a penchant at these film gatherings to sleep all day and hold meetings all night. Things never begin to boom until two or three in the morning. Not that there is any ulterior motive in these owlish methods, but they like to put the agony off until the last possible moment. When they can't find anything else to do, they meet.

"TOMMY"

Around the lobby the very air was surcharged with an undercurrent of mystery. Several times the World correspondent heard morbid mutterings about somebody slipping something over on somebody else. There were other mutterings by others who did not propose to let anybody slip anything over on them if they could help it. We do not pretend to know what they were referring to, but we know it must have been something awful because they were so worked up about it.

All during the day little knots of partisans and bi-partisans held confabs. That is the way with all conventions. Everything is thrashed out in the lobby; then when meeting time comes, everything is cut and dried. Everyone knows what they are going to do and they do it in a perfunctory way.

Settling things in the lobby is perhaps the real reason for lateness of meetings. Be that as it may, there was one noticeable feature about this lobbying that deserves honorable mention and must be placed to the credit of the business. There was no bar-room orations or bar-room groups. Ordinarily at a convention, when you want to find a man, look for him in the cafe; but the rule didn't work in Cleveland. For the benefit of anxious wives at home, the World can state positively that every film man present conducted himself like a gentleman around the hotel and left the bar to take care of itself.

Of course it is not meant to infer that, under the stress of oratory, certain members were not now and then tempted to go and wet their whistle, but if they did so, they went as single spies and not in batallions. There were no weeping jags, and no member of the tournament went to bed with his boots on.

At 5:30 Saturday afternoon the members got together. Just when the dinner bell was about to ring, but when great men gather together to deliberate, digestion waits on appetite. About twenty-five Independent exchanges answered roll call, and just here it is proper to remark that they were about the healthiest and scrappiest bunch of exchange men the present scribe has seen together at any one time. They fairly bristled with independence and dared to call their souls their own.

The N. I. M. P. A. is the orphan child of the late lamented Film Service Association. Many of its members formerly belonged to the F. S. A. The new association contains a number of men who have profited by the mistakes of the beloved deceased and they know the pitfalls to be sidestepped, or think they do.

We deny with emphasis that we are superstitious, but it must be confessed that we observed with certain inward qualms, some of the Latin mottoes on the wall. On a panel above the chairman's head was carved in letters bold, the Latin motto, "SALVE."

Of course, everybody knows that "Salve" in Latin means "I greet you," but of late a similar word has come to denote, metaphorically, an oozy, greasy substance for remedial application to sores or wounds. It may have had some bearing on all that talk we had heard about "slipping one over." So let us hope that "Salve," according to Webster, means the healing of whatever ills now beset the N. I. M. P. A.

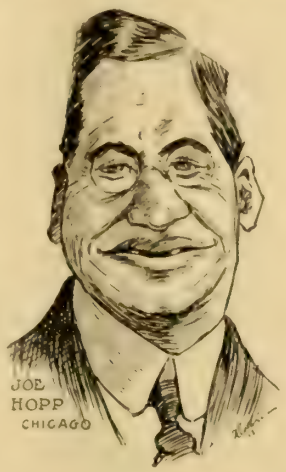
These ills were carefully gone over when the meeting began. Much time was wasted, as usual, by different members airing petty troubles that would not interest anybody to repeat. Then the Sales Company came in for some awful wallops. The broken vow was lying in state for those who cared to view the remains, while Mr. Manheimer of New York administered to individual manufacturers some hard kicks in the slats.

The question of exclusive territory for the Alliance exchanges was the star bout of the evening. Somebody happened to remember that the lobby was full of Sales Company members, and it was decided to call them in and put them through the third degree. A scouting party was sent out to round up the party of the second part.

There was a rattling of chains as the culprits were led in with a hang-dog look upon their faces.

They shambled into the rear seats but were yanked to the front by official command. As they stood huddled together in a group, the manufacturers reminded us of that famous painting of the Christian martyrs about to be devoured by lions, while Nero and the populace of Rome looked on. The dining-room orchestra downstairs was playing appropriate music.

After a dull, sickening silence, the Sales Company members as individuals were asked why they had not complied with the demands of the Alliance. Mr. Cochrane (Tommy) of the Imp Company, who seemed to be the natural spokesman, replied that there had been no demands that he had ever seen. He suggested that if the Alliance had any complaints or demands to make, it would be a good idea to write them down on paper and submit them to the Sales Company. The Sales Company could not be expected to grant any concessions to an Alliance that had never officially asked for any.



It began to dawn on the Alliance that perhaps, after all, their grievances had been rankling in their imaginations, when all the time they thought the Sales Company was aware of said grievances. A problem in mental telepathy, as it were. It was decided before adjournment that the Sales Company could not be reasonably expected to grant requests that had never been made. Also, acting on Mr. Cochrane's suggestion, it was decided to make certain requests of the Sales Company, through a representative committee of exchange men.

Mr. Horsley was next on the pan. David is some talker. He also proved himself to be some table-pounder. David was requested to throw some light on the question of exclusive territory as applied to Alliance members. Everybody knows that it is easy to get the goat of an honest man. Perhaps David is too honest, but anyhow, somebody stole David's goat.

The Moving Picture World does not condone the use of "the shorter and uglier word" at any of the meetings of its large family of beloved children. Neither does it hear with indifference when the children talk about being able to buy and sell one another. Nursery talk. Things were getting to a point where Mr. Hollenden, the hotel man, would soon be in the market for a new table, when "Tommy," with his usual presence of mind, began to rap Davy on the shins with his cane, while the orchestra downstairs was playing "Every little movement has a meaning all its own."

At this moment Bill Swanson stepped into the breach. As opposed to the excitable oratorical style of Horsley, Swanson is your true soothsayer. We have seen Mr. Swanson address two assemblages at two different times, and both times under the same circumstances. Twice we have seen him as the outcast orphan boy, peeping through a crevice at the feast in the banquet hall; twice have we seen him led in disgrace to the high table, and twice have we heard him speak. Each time he was heard to speak he cooed at times like the dove and erstwhile roared like the noble lion.

Bill Swanson, philosopher, gave the best monologue on exclusive territory that has been pulled for some time. We cannot tell exactly what he said because it would be spoiled in the telling, but we can give you the main facts. Like all Swanson addresses it began with a story and ended with a story, with a few stories in between. It began in humility and ended in triumph. If John D. Rockefeller had known that Bill was in town pouring oil on troubled waters, he would have wept with joy. Hand it to Bill.

Mr. Swanson said he was in favor of granting exclusive territory if the Alliance could map out a plan. He pointed out with infinite delicacy that it is the Sales Company's business to make and sell film and that they did not have the time to settle local squabbles, hundreds and sometimes thousands of miles away. Bill made it plain that the exchanges were expecting the Sales Company to do what they ought to do themselves. The matter of exclusive territory concerns renters more than it does the Sales Company, therefore, why don't the exchanges draw up their own plan instead of expecting the Sales Company to sit down and dope it out for them. The manufacturers have troubles of their own. Moreover, what constitutes "exclusive territory?" Can the renters define it or confine it? If so, let them do it. Mr. Swanson illustrated the fact that sub-renting was really at the bottom of bad exchange conditions. So long as exchanges sub-let reels they are bound to come into competition with their own stuff, and what power has the Sales Company over such a condition, and how can they be expected to sit down and cry about it?

The speaker likened films to any other commodity when it comes to granting exclusive territory. He took hats for example and explained that the man who can guarantee the biggest standing order is the man who is going to get the exclusive agency in his particular town for those particular hats. There are well-known principles of wholesale and retail, just the same as there are for supply and demand, and since moving pictures are talked about as a pure commercial commodity they will probably have to be classed as such.

You never should have told us that, O rare Bill Swanson! Of course you didn't mean to, but you struck a jarring note when you likened films to hats and put them in a class with carrots and tobacco, boots and shoes, bricks and lumber. All the way to Cleveland; all the time in Cleveland, and all the way back from there, the writer never heard the words "Art" or "Quality."

As long as moving pictures mean nothing but "releases" and "cold copy," the business will be groping in the dark. What does quality care about "exclusive territory" and what does quality know about "standing orders" and all that sort of rot? Give the people quality and they know it in an instant. They know more about it than the men who make the pictures.

On the train, to and from Cleveland, the satisfaction of some of the manufacturers with their own product explains a whole lot. When a man is entirely satisfied with his own goods you need never expect any better from him. Instead of getting together and telling each other how good they are, it would be a little more to the point if they told each other the truth, instead of putting that unpleasant job up to the only paper in the trade that can truthfully say that it has the welfare of every moving picture man at heart.

It seems to be characteristic of too many film men to ignore the important matter of better quality in and better presentation of the picture to the public. On the other hand, at the least personal grievance they call a meeting and spend much money on railroad fares, hotels, banquets, etc. And the ridiculous aspect is that no matter what the grievance, the meetings are heralded with much trumpeting and, like a political campaign, both sides have plenty of ammunition to fire at each other. To hear them talk the day before the meeting, they are sure to win, they have already the enemy beaten to a frazzle, but when the meeting is called to order, all these imaginary or real charges vanish away and the meeting is generally ended with a jollification in the shape of a banquet.

This was the case at the meeting of Cleveland. To hear the members of the Alliance, they had all the proofs to bust the Sales Company and the members of the Sales Company were as sure of winning the day.

When both sides unbosomed themselves and gave vent to all their grievances and charges, persons not familiar with the ways of the film men, would have expected a genuine war to the knife. But, when they did convene, they started to argue and little by little cooled down and parted seemingly the best of friends.

The greatest surprise was an invitation tendered by such good-natured manufacturers as Pat Powers, D. Horsley, Tom Cochrane, Bill Steiner, Geo. Magie, Mark Dintenfass, etc., who, forgetting the bitter attacks made against their organization, the Sales Company, invited everyone to a most pleasant eight-mile automobile ride to some woods in the suburbs of Cleveland, where we found at a Summer restaurant, a most delicious chicken dinner.

On the return to the hotel, each one shook hands and each one took his grip to return home, delighted with—not the meeting—but with the kind invitation from the manufacturers.

Let us hope that when the members of the Alliance and the members of the Sales Company meet in New York, that they will be as friendly in the meeting room as they were at the banquet table. A little conciliation on both sides would bring the desired harmony.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Prominent among our visitors this week were J. H. Allsup Blackledge, president of the Lucimer Film Company, San Francisco; J. A. King, manager Great Western Film Company, Winnipeg, Manitoba, and L. W. Brophy, president Yale Theater Company, operating theaters in Missouri, Texas and Oklahoma. Each of these gentlemen was greatly interested in the article contributed by J. W. Jennings, in our issue of November 5, agreeing that the writer had given the only plausible method to remedy the present situation of the moving picture business. This seems to be the general concensus of opinion; the proper man to lead the movement being the only requisite necessary to make it successful, for the idea is already very popular. Other visitors at the World's Chicago office were: L. W. Brophy, president Yale Theater Company, Muskegee, Okla.; J. Hruby, Hruby's Photoplay, Dalton, Ill.

MISTAKES OF A NEAR EDITOR.

Current Release by Our Screamerio Editor. Novelized by the Stenographer.

Delicately tinted in pale blue. Split reel. Tragedy and Comedy. About 7½ feet.

Act I.—Scene 1. Office of the Moving Picture World. Western representative entertaining group of visiting exhibitors. Assistants and stenographer "grinding out dope." Enter irate exhibitor (we know he's an exhibitor because he carries a little grip; we also know he is irate because he is madly waving a blue covered magazine).

Exhibitor: Say, who's boss here? I want to see him right away. I want my fifteen cents back. Whatinell did you print that joke for? (He tries to say more, but he's all out of wind.)

Fearing he may cause a scene, assistant pulls him out of the range of the camera and tries to pacify him.

Assistant: What's the trouble, old man? Whose fifteen cents do you want? What joke are you talking about? Etc. ad. libitum.

Exhibitor hastily looks through the "blue covered magazine" he is carrying, finds the place and reads aloud: "The Popular Mechanics magazine for September contains an article that was read with interest by those following the moving pictures here. It is entitled 'The Making of Moving Pictures' and is well illustrated, showing the interior of numerous studios," etc. Now I went and bought one of those books, but I can't find the article. I want you to show me, or you will have to give me the fifteen cents I paid for the book.

Assistant: My dear man, you are in wrong. This is the office of the Moving Picture World, not the Moving Picture Abuse; and the only advice I can give you is to write to the editor of that paper. He will be glad (?) to return your fifteen cents. He always acknowledges his mistakes very quickly. (Profuse apologies by the exhibitor.)

Act II.—Same setting. Same cast. Only different exhibitor. (We say different exhibitor, because this one happened to be fat, and you know that very few exhibitors are.)

Enter "different exhibitor" also waving blue covered magazine.

Exhibitor: Say, I want to stop this paper right away. It's no good anyway; besides you send me too many bills. I paid for last year in advance, now you write and tell me to pay up. What kind of business is this, anyway. (Starts to pull a bunch of letters from his pocket.)

Assistant runs to his rescue. We readily see he is in the wrong pew, because we never send out bills, all our subscribers pay in advance without urging. Besides, the "blue cover" tells us what's coming.

Assistant: My dear man, you, too, are in wrong. This is the office of the Moving Picture World. Just sit down and write your little grievance to the office of the Abuse. Most likely he made a mistake and he will be glad (?) to rectify it.

Exhibitor: Well, I guess I'll subscribe for your paper, for I see you have the goods. (Pulls out a $2 bill. After getting his receipt he backs away smiling.)

AGAIN WE REPEAT "WHAT BECOMES OF THE TITLES?"

Wednesday night, at the Orpheum, we saw a rather funny mixup, a sort of coincidence, as it were. The Vitagraph release, "The Renunciation," was begun with the Biograph title of the same name. Some in the audience noticed it, and wondered when the Biograph had engaged the new company, for they could not recognize the Vitagraph players in Biograph roles. Agan we repeat "What becomes of the titles?" The Premier Title Company, of 330 East Thirty-fifth street, should offer their services to the General Film Company.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Plaza Theater is using three singers daily with its picture performances. These are Leonard Chick, tenor; Francklyn Wallace, lyric tenor, and Harry Chick, baritone, with Butts Eberly at the piano. Even with these additional attractions, the house continues to be a 5-cent show and is doing fine business; and it is using big advertisements in the papers and finds that they pay, too. People will always go where they get the best.

The Virginia Theater is now the home of Independent films only. This makes Manager Neonen have one Independent house and one licensed house, the Maryland. It is up to the manufacturer to show which brings in the better receipts.

The Capitol Film Company is making a place for itself in the motion picture business. They have put out some good plays which have been well received. Manager Boernstein has succeeded in establishing an excellent company. The players which produce these dramas are actors who know their art, and they are under the able stage management of Mr. James. Many of the first runs of the Capitol Film Company have been seen here at the Empress.

Despite the fact that business is a little slow just at present at the theaters, the exchanges are busier than ever filling orders for new theaters and additional demands for old customers. The Paramount Film Company, since its consolidation with the Craft Film Company has increased its force and is supplying many houses in the nearby States. The Moore Film Exchange has likewise got its hands full, a portion of this being occasioned by Mr. Moore's recent trip through the South, when he added many new managers to his list. Mr. Moore wants to take another trip in a nearby territory, but just at present business at home will not permit him doing so.

The introduction of motion pictures at the Sunday concerts of the Gaiety Theater has proved an enjoyable feature, adding a dignity that would not be possible to a purely musical show of this class.

Manager Brylawski is always adding new features at his theaters. If it is not new pictures, it is something new in the musical line, either to assist the silent drama or to rest his patrons that they may better enjoy the next picture. He is of the opinion that music and motion pictures, both of sterling quality, will hold audiences longer than any other acts.

The Empress has been making a specialty of well established plays or the dramatization of novels of merit, such as "She Stoops to Conquer," "Thelma" and others. Manager Notes always includes some exceptional dramatization in his Sunday bill.

Manager Le Mott, of the Hippodrome, knows how to keep his patrons by pleasing them and educating them at the same time. He has some of the finest pictures for illustrated songs that are to be found in the city. Too frequently the manager thinks that "any old thing" will do for such illustrations, but a falling off in the door receipts soon proves that people will go where they can get something better. This is an age when the public wants the best, and if the manager wants to keep his patrons he must give them what they want in this respect.

From the point of years in the business, Manager Avery, of the Alhambra, ranks among the first in this city. His house has become a mecca for many of the school girls and boys, who do not hesitate to ask the manager to place certain plays on his bills on certain days. Then these students attend in a body. The list of plays requested by these students are always of a high literary and educational standard and show that the moving picture business has been well studied, for the manufacturer is always mentioned when making these requests. The motion picture industry is not confined to those who make it a commercial business, but the public, too, is studying it. These students know just what they want and Manager Avery is always ready to satisfy them. It is interest like this that helps a house and the industry, also.

A WORD FOR THE FOREIGN MANUFACTURER.

Brooklyn, N. Y., October 25, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In a recent issue, Man About Town asks "Is there an objection to foreign pictures?" Now as an exhibitor who enjoys beautiful scenery and photography and unsurpassed dressing, staging and acting, and as one who caters to a refined, intelligent class of people, I will say No. Decidedly, no. But there may be on the part of some of the manufacturers of the raw, crude junk now being put on the market and whose sales are hurt by the works of art put out by Ambrosia, Itala, Eclair, Lux and Great Northern. It does not require much intelligence to understand the work of the European manufacturer, no matter how complicated the plot, while of the others it requires a whole lot of it to understand the nerve of these so-called manufacturers of "every reel a feature film" at putting such junk on the market. As far as the Ten Commandments are concerned, how many great plays or books are written that the story is not founded on the breaking of some one of the Commandments. Are all American pictures founded on the graces and none on the disgraces? There are times when the European manufacturer is a little plainer in showing a crime than is necessary, but that is because they do not practice hypocrisy as much there as we do here, for instance, take our sermon preaching but not practising editors of the great dailies, who give columns day after day in describing some revolting murder, crime or divorce, even to the minutest detail and in their Sunday editions write about notorious men and women and their crimes and sins, then listen to those same fakirs rap the moving pictures.

Yours for the best in moving pictures,

ONE OF THE MILLIONS.

WHAT BECOMES OF THE TITLES?

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—In your issue of the Moving Picture World, of the 22d inst., I have just read in your "Chicago Notes" column that your friendly, the visiting exhibitors, have you somewhat up a tree in regard to what becomes of the titles attached to the various films.

As I have the extreme pleasure of inspecting about fifty of these reels each day, I am in a good position to observe them in all their stages of perfection and imperfection, and I believe that I am stating the truth when I say that the great fault lies with the operator or person who has charge of returning the films to the exchange. The operator does little or no damage to the title when running the film through his machine, it is when he is through with the film that the title is destroyed. Naturally in a hurry to get away from the theater, the man in charge of the film neglects in nine cases out of ten, to place a band of any description upon the reel; as a consequence, when it reaches the exchange, there will be anywhere from one to three feet of film jammed in the bottom of the can or case, the result being that one and probably more patches must be made in the most important part of the entire film, the title, and of course the title is entirely gone in a short time.

Of course it will be said that it is up to the exchange to supply new titles; but wouldn't it be much easier (inasmuch as most exchanges ship each reel enclosed in a durable paper band with the printed request to return in the same manner) for the operator to take a few extra moments of his time and see that the reel is returned in as good condition as he desires to receive it?

But, for heaven's sake, don't blame the poor inspector, who has nothing more than his two hands, his scissors, knife and little cement pot.

Yours truly,

JACK FALLIS.

A DISCLAIMER.

Washington, D. C., October 24, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—Being the regular operator of the so called White Theater of your article in the World of September 3, 1910, and not receiving the roast that was handed the rest of the outfit by our unknown friend, I have been accused by a member of the Arcade Company of being the author of said article.

You would do me a great favor, and I think it is due me, to publish a statement, or at least, write to the manager, F. L. Averill, clearing me of said accusation.

ANNIVERSARY OF SWAAB'S PALACE.

Philadelphia, Pa., October 25, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—We gave our first anniversary October 10 at our house over in Gloucester, N. J., The Swaab Palace, 16 and 18 Burlington street. On this occasion we had a special program and an added attraction, "The Village Comedy Four." These four boys are very popular here and they always make a big hit. This time they were a knockout; doors opened at 6.45 P. M. and at 7.05 we had 700 tickets sold and 500 on the street. We never saw anything like it. We also gave a four-page folder with our compliments and a photo of Miss Florence Turner, the Vitagraph girl, who, by the way, is quite a favorite with our people. The whole town has been talking about our anniversary and they would like to see one every week—so would I.

JOHN HAYES.

[Congratulations, Mr. Hayes; sorry we could not be there to enjoy the event.—Eds. M. P. W.]

THE CHANGE DAILY ABUSE.

The Dalles, Ore., October 27, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I have read an article in the Moving Picture World, under date of October 22, headed "The 'Change Daily' Abuse," by C. W. Lawford, which I consider a well written article and every word of it true, and I think that the daily change abuse in the small towns is the worst blow to the moving picture industry that can be dealt, and I agree with Mr. Lawford, the only thing that causes this abuse is the insane desire to put the other fellow out of business, instead of forming a mutual agreement among themselves. I note that Mr. Lawford says ease up on the exchange man and the manufacturers. Now I will ask Mr Lawford what he can say when it is your exchange that starts this same abuse. Now I do not know anything about the conditions in other places, but do know the conditions in my own town, and it is a known fact that the only licensed exchanges that we have in Portland, Ore., and Seattle, Wash., belong to the same people and is the only licensed exchange where we can secure licensed films. Also it is a known fact that the People's Amusement Company, which own and control about fifty different picture houses in the Pacific Northwest, up until just a few weeks ago was controlled by the same people that control the film exchange; that the same man was president of both companies, and one set of officers transacted the business for the film exchange as well as the People's Amusement Company, so, plainly speaking, they were one and the same. Now I was the first house here and was here six months before another house opened and for two years there were never more than two reels used to a change and never more than three changes a week, until in 1909 this amusement company opened a house here and started in by using three reels, changes three times a week. Now about a month ago they commenced to use three reels and four changes a week, and no doubt they will be using daily changes here before long. Now when a house with a film exchange behind them starts this abuse, what is the other man going to do? He has to keep up with them or drop out of business. Anyone can see what kind of a service you would get from an exchange conducted in the same manner, and after putting up with their unfair treatment for some time I was compelled to use Independent films. There are just two houses here in a city of 6,000, and there is enough business for both houses, and both would do just as much business by using three changes a week as if we would use daily changes, as no matter how often you change the people are not going to come every night. Not many of them. And the few that do come every night will soon get tired of coming at all, and I think it is very wrong to try to give the people of your little town all the output of the film manufacturers; but by giving a good clean show, using fair grade of films and not too many of them you will keep the people wanting more. But as soon as you commence to try and crowd your trade you are going to lose money and deal a blow to the moving picture industry. I say use less pictures and give the manufacturers more time to produce good subjects, then perhaps we will be able to get more good comedy films, which there is such a big demand for. But I say again, when your exchange starts the abuse what is the other fellow going to do but try and keep up? LEW F. CULLINS,

THE PRESS AND THE PICTURE.

Rockford, Ill., October 26, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—Regarding newspaper agitation. I asked our local newspaper to publish Rev. Jackson's article in their Sunday issue, which the manager kindly did as per enclosed copy. If other towns which have shows, that advertise enough to keep the local newspapers' friendship, would do the same thing, the article would get a big circulation outside of the moving picture circles, and it would seem to me to be a good suggestion for the general advantage of all. The Mirror Screen picture is holding its own on the 4th and 10 day run, against 2nd run, ice cream cones, Wilton rug souvenirs, etc. I notice their business falls away as soon as they quit giving away. With regards,

Yours very truly,
W. CLARKE.

[Right you are, Bro. Clarke. We would like to hear from other exhibitors who take an interest in public opinion. The article referred to, "The Moving Picture and Its Enemies," appeared in our issue of September 24. We will gladly send duplicates to any exhibitor who will hand it to the editor of his local paper. We have mailed you another copy so that your file may be complete.—Eds. M. P. W.]

Santa Barbara, Cal., October 18, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—Enclosed find newspaper clipping, taken from a recent issue of the ill-fated "Los Angeles Times" which, by the way, may prove to be of interest to many readers of your valuable publication. Showing that the press of this portion of the U. S. very often in their columns give space as to the doings of the motion picture producers and exhibitors. Even the Hearst papers (who in the Eastern cities delight in giving all that pertains to the moving picture game a roast) are very partial to the business out here. And it is my prediction that in the near future the press of the entire country shall devote its column of moving picture news as it now does to the dramatic, and this will be brought about by the progressive exhibitor as well as the producer and speaking of progressive exhibitors, California boasts of many; especially Los Angeles, which, by the way, leads all coast cities as a moving picture center.

So hoping that the enclosed article will prove of interest to the "editors" of the ever popular "Moving Picture World," I remain, Yours truly,

C. J. MARLEY,
La Petite Theater.

[Our thanks are due to Mr. Marley, also to Mr. Culpepper, of Los Angeles, who simultaneously sent us the "Times" article, which was printed in full in last week's World. We congratulate the Californians on having such progressive exhibitors and so many fine theaters and it is our intention to visit and write them up at an early date for the benefit of the effete East.—Eds M. P. W.]

SCENIC AND EDUCATIONAL FILMS WANTED.

Tacoma, Wash., October 23, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—We subscribe to the World and read every word of it, including the ads., every week. We don't see how we could do without it. Have taken great interest in your articles on the "usual thing" in motion pictures. That is just what we have been trying to get away from ever since we opened up, on September 14, last. But we find it exceedingly difficult. We have applied repeatedly to our exchange, The Ind. Western Film Exchange of Portland, Ore., for scenics and industrials. So far, have had but two scenics (foreign) and no industrials. Consequently, it made us prick up our ears when we saw in the World of 22d inst., the two articles, "Exploration and the Picture" and "The Cinematograph in Official Places." Now that is the stuff we want. To mention another article in the same issue, "What the Nickel Theater Does," the fourth paragraph of which mentions films which show us how the Panama Canal is being dug, how they hunt lions in Africa, or pick cotton in the South, or hunt in Alaska, etc., etc. The man who wrote that article must have been dreaming of an ideal nickel theater. We have written letters to about twenty-five commercial clubs of the big cities in the East and Middle West, a half dozen State Park Boards, two State Colleges of Agriculture, a dozen big manufacturing plants, and others, asking for motion pictures. The answer in every case so far has been "we have none."

Now, what is a poor exhibitor who wants to give his audiences something beside the "usual thing" going to do.

We seat 400 people. To-day our house has been crowded all day long. We will do record business to-day. Why? We have a beautiful scenic (the second one we have been able to get) the Ambrosio "Excursion on the Chain of Mont Blanc." The people are simply delighted with it. Why can't we get some pictures like this of our own scenery? We have as beautiful natural scenery in the United States as anywhere in the world. Why are the Independents so far behind in this line?

Pray pardon this long letter, but we must blow off steam to some one.

Yours very truly,
The Ideal Amusement Co.,
WM. W. HOYT.

MORE COMEDIES WANTED.

Chicago, October 29, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Referring to your article in the last Moving Picture World, speaking of a need for more good comedies, wish to say: that it is also our experience that we cannot get enough of good comedies, and at times no comedy at all.

We want at least one comedy every show to close the performance because we want to send them home laughing. Your statement that the people primarily want to be amused is quite true, and we think and in fact we know as far as our audiences are concerned that two out of every three or four reels should be good comedy.

Hoping that this letter may help induce the Film Manufacturers to produce more comedies, I am,

Yours very truly,
F. H. FRANKE,
The California Theater.

P. S.—Enclose one of our weekly programs.

[Mr. Franke's program is an eight-page affair, with considerable local advertising. Under each film title he gives a brief outline of the story. We note that he ran an Essanay night on October 24, a Vitagraph night on October 26 and a Biograph evening and matinee on October 29. Evidently Mr. Franke finds these exclusive programs attractive.—Eds. M. P. W.]

BIOGRAPH.

SUNSHINE SUE. There is an invisible power always attendant upon the truly innocent. A guardian angel that leads the way from the many pitfalls that threaten the young before they are able to realize the enormity of one false step. The human is endowed with free will, but during youth there is always that power reasoning for us, and our future depends upon harkening to it. Sue is the sunshine of the old home; ever smiling, singing and lifting the burden from the shoulders of her parents in their declining years. She is beloved by Tom, an honest country lad, who is at a loss to know how to evince it, she too carefree to understand. He was content to sit for hours and listen to her sing and play the old songs on the parlor organ. Fate seemed to be taking good care of affairs, until one day a Summer boarder pays the homestead a visit. Good looking, easy of manner and the owner of an automobile, Sue feels quite elated when he pays her some attention. She readily consents to taking a ride with him, which meets the approval of her parents, who look upon the young man as highly reputable. Ah! here is the time-honored trick of fate; the playing with fire, so often the beginning of the end. Some miles away from the village, the auto becomes conveniently disabled, and as it is assumed it will be some time before it is righted, the young man suggests that they go to the roadhouse nearby for rest and refreshments. So well entertained is she that the time flies swiftly and when she suggests returning home she is made to believe that it is too late to return home that night. Stunned at first by this intelligence, she awakens to the full realization of the situation and excluding the young man from the room, she passes the night alone in dreadful anxiety, for she imagines the disquietude her dear old folks are suffering. And rightly, too, for at dawn we see her poor old father with faithful Tom, after an all-night vigil at the front gate sorrowfully dragging himself up to the cottage door. The young man returns to Sue in the morning and persuades her to go with him to the city, promising to marry her upon arrival. To this she consents and he installs her in a furnished room while he ostensibly goes to make arrangements for their marriage. While he is away she writes this news to her father. But, alas, the poor girl is later made to appreciate the cruel truth of the situation when the young man pretends his father objects to his marrying just at present. He, of course, reasons that she has gone too far to turn back. In fact, she fully realizes her awful predicament, for she knows how the world will regard her apparent indiscretion, so ashamed to return home, she seeks employment. In this direction she meets with the indignities often afforded the innocent by those human vultures who call themselves men. Her experience is enough to convince her of the falseness of the world she would enter, so back home she goes the same day to be received with open arms by her dear old daddy, whose searching gaze she has met with a smile.

EDISON COMPANY.

THE KEY OF LIFE.—The first view shows the death of an old Brahmin priest and his presentation to his favorite pupil, a young American artist, of the sacred robe of Krishna, together with a copy of the Divine Book of Mysteries, with an injunction to search for the Key of Life, which is hidden in the book and with which the robe itself is somehow concerned.

Then we see the young man in his studio in New York surrounded with symbols of his studies and evidences of his life in other countries. He is reading the Book of Mysteries, while his little sister is studying the laws of love in company with a young man who is evidently her tutor. The girl plays with a little kitten and when the love scene passes and the betrothal is announced to the brother, the kitten is left upon the latter's desk while he continues his studies alone.

Suddenly he comes upon a paragraph which he has read, without understanding, before. When it is flashed upon the screen it tells us that Reincarnation is the Key of Life, and that if wrapped in the robe of Krishna, the ninth invocation be spoken before the shrine of Brahma, a reincarnation will take place. Getting the robe of Krishna, he opens its wrappings and unfolds it to view. Then he looks about him for an object which shall pass through the stages from animal life to humanity. He lights upon the kitten, which he places in a bowl, draping over it the robe of Krishna, while he repeats the invocatiton before the shrine of Brahma. A light vapor rises from the bowl, which with the kitten suddenly disappears and a sort of human kitten stands upon the pedestal.

She is rather a charming young woman with cat-like qualities, which become more evident as he becomes better acquainted with her. He helps her down from the pedestal and admires her beauty, playing with her as he would with a kitten. She alternately rubs against him and scratches his hand. Then, suddenly, just when he feels that he has begun to teach her the human feeling of love, she darts after the bird in the cage and he catches her only in time to protect it. A little later she makes the discovery of the cream in the pitcher which she wants to lap up. He shows her how to drink properly, but it is evidently not the natural way for her. With kitten like curiosity she plays with a dagger until she scratches her finger. Then he shows her how dangerous a thing it is to tamper with.

Finally, after much patience and coaxing, he succeeds in making her understand a little of love, and is just about to seal the understanding with a kiss when he hears a sound at the door, his sister returning. Lest his position and that of the kitten-woman be misunderstood, he secretes her behind the curtain and admits his sister, who announces a shopping expedition, kisses him and leaves him alone again. But that kiss has been enough to rouse the cat-like jealousy of the reincarnated one, and she flies into a rage. Seizing the dagger she makes a vicious lunge at him, which just grazes his shoulder. He takes it away from her and drops to his seat, his head upon his hands in despair.

Then slowly the reincarnated one begins to understand that she is neither cat nor human, and despair fills her because of the attack upon the man who would have loved her. She seizes the dagger and is about to end her own human existence, when suddenly a vision of Brahma in the clouds appears and stays her hand. Ascending the steps of the shrine, she turns and faces the now awakened artist and tells him that she understands his situation, and goes back to her million lives on the way from cat-hood to woman-hood again, in regular order. As he steps forward her face changes more to that of the cat, and suddenly she is gone entirely. Turning around, he discovers the bowl, the robe of Krishna and the kitten exactly the same in location and appearance as when the incarnation first began.

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA IN CAMP AT SILVER BAY, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y. The Boy Scouts movement was started in England by Lieut.-General Sir Robert S. S. Baden-Powell, K. C. B., where it met with immediate response and is being developed in this country through the study of woodcraft, as preached by Ernest Thompson Seton. The organization, founded on the broadest lines, is open to any boy of twelve or over. It need not necessarily be a separate organization. Any club of boys can add the Scouts' Organization to their present one by the application of the proper forms and methods. It is graded from the Chief Scout down through a number of officers to the lowest degree, which is called "tenderfoot" and which comprises the newest boys before they have learned enough to pass the first test and become Second Class Scouts. The main ideas are to encourage nature study, to be always honorable and loyal, and as the Scout Law has it, "To be prepared, which means you are always to be in a state of readiness in mind and body to do your duty."

From the above it will be seen what as a nation we may expect if our growing boys go through such experiences. The movement is democratic in the largest sense.

In our film, which was taken at Lake George and shows scenes of unusual beauty, we see the camp of boys going through their occupations and recreations of the day—rising, taking their morning dip, saluting the flag, the morning council and various sports and feats of woodcraft. We are shown at the end of the film the two gentlemen who are responsible for the movement in America, Ernest Thompson Seton and Dan Beard. In taking the picture we operated directly with the main organization in New York City and are showing it with their full approval.

RIDERS OF THE PLAINS.—In presenting "The Riders of the Plains" to the public the Edison Company takes considerable pride because the participants are not make-believe actors. Although the greater part of this film is a story picture, nevertheless the actors are the real things. The Indians are real Indians and the cowboys are real cowboys. The story was suggested by one of the commanding officers of this body of men and carried out under his instructions, as showing what has occurred time and time again in the annals of their life.

The entire story deals with horse stealing by the Indians. The Mounted Police are shown on post duty discovering the facts, reporting at Calgary Headquarters, and then a detachment goes out to bring back the guilty redmen; and we may be sure at this point that they will do so, for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are not allowed to return empty handed. They will follow their prey for hundreds of miles if necessary. Eventually the picture winds up with the capture of the redmen and their being brought to the prison at the Northwest Mounted Police Station at Calgary.

ESSANAY FILM COMPANY.

A FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE.—Frank Wellthy has just become engaged to the pretty Vivian Marlow, and the event is pleasantly celebrated when he informs his club friends of his good fortune in winning the belle of the city's fashionable smart set. Frank is also considered a good catch, as he is rich, handsome and the idol of the society world.

The next evening at the reception given by Frank to Vivian and his friends, where the engagement is formally announced, a telegram is received by the young man with the news that, owing to unfortunate speculations, he is a ruined man. Stunned the message drops from his hands, and soon the news of his failure is whispered from one to another of the guests, and all hastily leave.

The next morning an auction is held at which all the household furniture is sold. The servants bid Lan a tearful farewell and Frank is left alone to bequeath save for James, his faithful valet who refuses at first to leave his master. The scene is here interrupted by the entrance of the burly iceman but Frank informs him that his establishment will no longer need ice. The iceman expresses his regret, but not informed of Frank's complete failure, asks him to buy tickets to the iceman's ball. Frank smiles and lays out his last two dollars assuring the iceman he will be glad to attend the ball.

The evening of the ball Frank, who has fallen into the depths of despair, resolves that he will seek diversion in actually attending the event to which he has tickets. After a really pleasant evening he returns to his rooms, while the face of a young lady, whose name he remembers as Fanny Parker, haunts him in his dreams.

The next morning finds him looking for work. He is about to give up disheartened when he meets his former iceman, to whom he tells his unfortunate circumstances and inquires if he would be likely to obtain a job with the ice company were he to apply.

Inquiry at the company's office results favorably and Frank, armed with a pair of ice tongs, is put on the wagon. At one of the houses where he delivers ice he is pleasantly surprised to meet the young lady whose acquaintance he had made the previous evening. After a short visit Frank is invited to call again.

The days go by and Frank, finding he is earnestly in love with Fanny, proposes and is accepted. Later they are established in a small cottage as happy as two larks, both confident of a radiant future before them.

The next day is pay day, and with it comes a new change in Frank and Fanny's lives. James, Frank's former valet, enters the ice company's office while Frank is in line and joyfully thrusts a newspaper into his hands. The news concerns the tremendous rise of certain mining stock of which Frank has a good portion, but which he had for a long time thought worthless.

The following scenes show Frank and Fanny established in new quarters and entertaining their friends. An amusing scene closes the film when callers are announced. The cards bear the names of Mrs. Marlow and her daughter, Vivian. Frank remembers the rebuffs he had received after the crash, when he had called on Vivian and her mother, only to have his card returned with the words "not at home" written across the face of it, and he returns the cards through James with the same message written on it.

A WESTERNER'S WAY.—Jason Watkins, a real estate and loan agent, enters his office in the little Arizona town of Navajo, to find that during the night robbers have visited the place and broken into his safe, taking with them a large sum of money and other valuables.

Watkins immediately notifies the sheriff, a posse is hurriedly organized and a search made for the culprits. However, their search is unfruitful, and Sheriff Watkins dismisses the posse and rides on to a neighboring town.

In the meantime Big Bill Hastings, the robber, who has hidden in the hills until satisfied the posse has given up the chase, has examined his loot and stowed it away in his shirt bosom. For the first time in twenty-four hours he has thought of food, and now finding his inner man crying to be fed, he mounts his horse and cautiously rides down the trail.

A few hours later he enters a gambling house in the town to which the sheriff has also ridden, eats and drinks, and after turning the roulette wheel a few times just to test his luck, saunters out, and into the arms of Sheriff Wells. The sheriff recognizes him and draws his gun before Big Bill has recognized his pursuer.

Bill submits to the arrest good naturedly, and goes back with the sheriff to the hotel, where they must wait for a morning train back to Navajo. The evening drags slowly and the sheriff suggests that they visit the gambling house just to pass the time away.

At the table the sheriff sits down just for a friendly game or two, though he is warned by Bill that he is likely to get cleaned. The sheriff plays and loses, and unmindful of Bill's advice lays out more chips on the table. Bill yawns and stalks to the door, and turning to the sheriff says: "I am going to bed, sheriff; I will be there when you come."

In the West in the early days a man's word was as good as his bond, and despite the fact that Big Bill would probably serve a long sentence if found guilty, the sheriff knew the bad man would keep his word.

Later Sheriff Wells, stripped of his money, and of Jason Watkins' money, which he had taken off his prisoner, enters his room at the hotel. Bill is there, sleeping peacefully, but awakens when the door closes. The sheriff confesses his loss of the money. Bill listens silently and finally tells the sheriff to go to bed.

Shortly after, when the sheriff has dropped off to a restless sleep, Bill slips a weapon from the sheriff's belt and slips out of the room.

The next scene shows him stealthily entering the gambling house, where the proprietor, alone, is counting up the day's receipts. He is masked and the proprietor is unable to recognize him though his intentions are easily apprehended. In the end Big Bill leaves with the stolen money, gambled away by the sheriff, and returns it to him. The sheriff, glad to get the money back, allows his prisoner to go after exacting a promise of reformation from him.

GAUMONT.

(G. Kleine.)

PHARAOH: OR, ISRAEL IN EGYPT. The first scene shows Pharaoh surrounded by his court refusing to listen to the appeal of Moses for the liberation of the Israelites. Nestling close to the King of Egypt is his first-born child, and although the Prophet threatens to have all the first-born Egyptians stricken with death, Pharaoh hardens his heart and refuses the liberty of the Israelitish people. Then the plot thickens. A feast is prepared at which Moses attends, but before that the slaying of the lamb of the Passover is shown, and the sprinkling of the blood of the lamb over the lintel and door posts is vividly pictured, the old buildings and the costuming of the participants in the ceremony being true to the period. The feast of the Passover follows, the Israelites being seated around a table, awaiting the coming of Moses. As he appears his people receive him reverently, and the lamb is brought in to be eaten with the unleavened bread which, in the form known to us as Passover cakes is handed to those present by the prophet.

The pictures depicting the tenth plague are finely conceived. First, we see the boy son of the King lying on a couch, attended by the women of the court, who amuse him by playing the harp and other instruments until he falls asleep. Pharaoh enters, and fondly kisses his first-born, enjoining the attendants to keep still that the boy may enjoy his sleep undisturbed. Suddenly, the lad awakes, as though seized with internal pains, and in a few seconds, after severe torture and writhing of the body, he is dead on his back, the victim of the threat uttered by Moses. Another deathbed scene is shown, of a lowly mill girl's son, and we see the herculean form of the father pushing two immense grindstones round, grinding corn, whilst the boy sleeps on the ground. The mother helps the father in pushing the stones round, when, with the same suddenness as was witnessed in Pharaoh's palace, the mysterious illness seizes the child, and the youngster, only about four years of age, gives a wonderful impersonation of the agony which might very well be real. Finally, he succumbs to the stroke, and then, in the hall of the Egyptian King's palace, we see the bereft parents bringing in their dead offspring to show to their equally bereaved sovereign, all cursing Moses and lamenting their loss.

Then, in the background, the Prophet and his followers appear, slowly walking down the center of the enraged people, threatened at every step, but calm and serene in the power he has been the means of showing the Egyptians. Again he makes his appeal to the King for the release of the Israelites, and this time he is successful.

The final scene shows a street lined with the native inhabitants, eager and expectant, awaiting the exodus of the 400 years enslaved people. On come the Israelites, pleased to go, each with his goods and chattels, the family, sheep, camels and a thousand and one impediments. Six hundred thousand was the number which left, and the Gaumont film shows a fair percentage of them.

LISBON BEFORE AND AFTER THE REVOLUTION. A very interesting series of pictures showing scenes in Lisbon, the principal streets and views of the more important buildings and harbor; also, Portuguese soldiers with King Manuel very much in evidence. There are also striking views portraying King Manuel's visit to England last year, with his welcome at Portsmouth, and the later visit to the city, and as an additional interesting item the view taken at King Edward's Funeral showing King Manuel and the other eight Kings. These in themselves should prove a big attraction to picture programs.

The views were taken Friday, October 7, by the company's special Paris representative, and they give a typical representation of the change that has taken place at Lisbon. We see the huge crowds in the public squares, the barricades and the soldiers, the horses and the wounded, and also the very nondescript crowds rushing hither and thither anxious for the latest information. The Republican flag is to be seen in many directions, and among the buildings that have suffered from the shells we have excellent pictures of the Royal Palace, with huge holes in the windows, lamp-posts damaged with bomb shells, ruined houses, and newspaper offices.

KALEM COMPANY.

FOR A WOMAN'S HONOR deals with that exciting and interesting period in Virginia which directly preceded the war. The story is that of a young Southern lawyer who has incurred the enmity of the father of the girl he hopes to marry by beating the old gentleman in a law suit. The young folks decide to override the parental authority by eloping and their plans are apparently working out excellently when an unforeseen incident changes the aspect of things entirely. It appears that the miller's wife, an old lady of some means, had met with a serious mishap during the evening and had fallen from the door steps where she was discovered by a shiftless negro who had happened by. The negro at first had gone to the old lady's aid but when he saw the contents of the handbag at her side his cupidity overcame his better feelings and he took the money and decamped. Shortly after the young elopers happened to ride by and seeing the woman in dire straits they dismounted from their horses and went to her assistance. The young man used his handkerchief to staunch a wound in the old lady's head and left it behind when he rode on with the girl. During this period, however, the young lady had had an opportunity and decided that she wanted to go back home. The lover gallantly acquiesced and she was able to get back into the house without being seen. The next morning the old lady was found dead by the road side and naturally the accusing finger was pointed at the young hero and in order to protect the honor of his sweetheart refused to explain his doings of the night before and it was only at the final trial, when the young man seemed in jeopardy of his life, that the girl summed up sufficient courage to tell the truth. She did this in the court room and, of course, under the circumstances the escapade was forgiven and the lovers united.

THE ATTACK ON FORT RIDGELY.—Fort Ridgely was a frontier post in northern Minnesota and upon the edge of the country infested by hostile Sioux lead by Little Crow. At the time when the whites had little reason to suspect an outbreak Little Crow formed a big war party and before troops could be organized and dispatched to the front had massacred hundreds of men, women and children. Fort Ridgely itself was saved through the goodness of Other Day, a friendly Indian girl, who informed Capt. McPhail of the uprising and plans of the attack on the fort thus enabling the little band of soldiers to put up one of the most remarkable defenses known in the history of early Indian warfare.

THE TAMING OF WILD BILL.—Bill never had felt the softening influence of love. He was a product of the days of '49 and he had stayed wild. He was about the wildest man in the Crazy Creek district, and that was going some. But there came a day when Bill tired of cooking his own grub and sewing on his own buttons, and he advertised his claim for sale. He was offered a pot of money by a Chicago investor and he could not know that the man was an arrant rogue who intended to swindle him out of the mine, so he traveled on a Pullman where he had many strange adventures—and landed in the city by the lake. Innocently enough he left his papers with the agent, who promptly proceeded to forge duplicates, and the swindle would have gone through had not the office stenographer conceived an admiration for Bill and slipped him a warning. Then things happened in earnest, and Bill did not come out second best. He was so far first there was no second, so the mine agent took it out on the typist and fired her. But Bill was waiting downstairs for a chance to thank her, and when he found out what the trouble was he offered his heart, hand and gold mine, all three of which found favor in the eyes of the little shorthand expert. And so they were married and lived happily ever after with never a thought of Reno, but it sure was a shock to the boys when they saw how a little five-foot runt from Chicago had tamed the wildness of the pride of Crazy Creek.

THE MYSTERY OF THE TORN NOTE.—When Mildred refused to marry Billy Sprague it was not so much because she did not love him as because Billy regarded it too much as a matter of course that one day they would be married. He said a tragic farewell like the handsome hero of the melodrama, and to herself Mildred hoped that he would not do anything rash, for she loved Billy and intended to accept him about the twentieth time of asking. But love's young dream turned into a nightmare the next morning when the mail brought a note from Billy. There was a corner torn off, but there was plenty enough left, for the last words were, "I am going to drown my s——." It was not long before the police were called in and there ensued a lively chase along the river bank for traces of the suicide. Mildred was too excited to help much, and she identified any chance article of clothing as the property of the late lamented Billy, including the suit of a chap who was taking a quiet swim. Many other things happened that added to the liveliness of life until one of the policemen suggested that they go to where Billy used to live and see if he had left any more promising clues as to the exact point where he proposed shuffling off the mortal coil. The first person they met was William himself, who was rather surprised to see Mildred's escort. He produced the torn note. In it he said he was going to drown his sorrows in the flowing bowl. But he had not taken a drink, so Mildred forgave him and the ring dented his pocketbook about $450.

THE GAMBLER'S CHARM.—The professional gambler of the old-fashioned sort is a fast disappearing type in the West, but Kenyon was one of the best of the old school. He played cards better than he did anything else, and he played a square game, content to enjoy only the advantage that came with his expertness. He strikes out for new fields and comes upon Joe Dakin's little girl, a tiny tot, who wins his instant regard. In response to his request she brings him a drink of water, and when he finds that she is fascinated by the tiny elephant on his watch guard he slips it off and makes her a present of it. Her father is a miner, but the lust of gaming is in his blood and he wastes his time at the saloon where there is a game always in progress. The gambler takes Jim's seat when he drops from the game, his funds exhausted, but presently Jim reappears, for he has taken the charm and offers this as his stake. Kenyon recognizes the charm and accuses Joe of having stolen it, not knowing that the child is his. There is an altercation in which Joe is wounded, and the gambler's distress is very genuine when he discovers the identity of the man. He goes to the house, where he meets a cold reception, but Joe takes the blame and the mother smilingly permits Kenyon to restore the charm to the little girl, giving him in exchange the baby's locket for luck. Joe braces up and so good luck went with the gambler's charm after all.

A MOUNTAIN WIFE. -In the mountain wilds of Tennessee there is no end to the manufacture of moonshine whiskey. Whole families live on this nefarious trade and many of them die by it. The men who work at this business are constantly hunted by United States revenue officers as violators of the law for manufacturing liquor without a special license.

The "Mountain wife" loves her husband and stands by and shields him from his enemies, the officers; when they are on his track she hides him, then throws them off his trail, giving him time to escape in the mountain fastenesses, as we are shown in this interesting and thrilling picture. The revenue men are hunting their man and meet an adventurous artist who joins them in the search. They come onto their quarry while he is busy at his still. He is seized and held at bay by the artist. A boy who is a friend of the moonshiner happens along and distracts the attention of the artist from the distiller who, taking advantage of his chance, snatches the gun from the would-be hero, turns it on him and escapes to his home.

The detectives make a direct line to the moonshiner's home; his wife hears them and hides him in the cellar, hiding herself in the garret. The officers come, find no trace of their man and leave, all but the artist, who says he will stay and watch for the reappearance of the fugitive. He hides behind a barrel. The husband and wife come from their hiding places; the courageous artist confronts the husband with a pistol. "Hands up!" he says, but does not count on the wife who "swats" him in the face with a pillow; and again the hunted one gets possession of the pistol, gives it to his wife, and she holds the amateur detective in durance vile while her husband escapes to the mountain fastnesses.

Now she does something that requires pluck and determination—she makes the daring chap mount a horse and, straddling another, she compels him at the pistol's point to ride to the railroad station, embark and decamp for foreign parts a defeated and wiser man.

She returns to her home, sends word to her husband that the coast is clear and tells him to come back to the cabin to help pack up their belongings that they will depart from the country and begin life anew.

The picture closes with an indescribable tableau of natural splendor, the escape of the man and his mountain wife to a place where they can work at an honest trade and live a good life free from offense to God and man.

PATHE FRERES.

MAX IN A DILEMMA. Max is in love with Kitty, who is willing but whose father regards a substantial bank balance as of more importance than a loving heart. Max rejected, returns to his chambers, and would like to die, but his courage fails him at the critical moment. He is interrupted in his reflections by a burglar. At the sight of Sykes, Max becomes inspired and offers him the sum of $500 to kill him before midnight. The thief agrees and departs. A new arrival now appears, who turns out to be a lawyer, who has called to inform Max that a large fortune has been left him by his uncle. Transported with joy, Max listens to inform Kitty's father and is of course, immediately accepted, and invited to dinner. During dinner a servant announces that a visitor wishes to speak to Max. He goes to meet the newcomer and is horrified to recognize Sykes whose existence he had temporarily forgotten. With a cry he dashes out into the street, runs for dear life is overtaken and tremblingly awaits his death blow. Judge of his happiness and surprise when Sykes coolly hands him back his $500, saying at the same time that he is not going to risk his precious neck simply to do Max a favor.

MICRO-CINEMATOGRAPHY RECURRENT FEVER. By means of a combination of the microscope with the camera, this picture depicts the course of this virulent fever. In Russia, which has at times been visited by terrible epidemics of recurrent fever, the disease is caused by the bite of a flea that carries the disease, while in Africa it is the tick found in that country that transmits the disease. The picture is illustrated with observations of the blood of a monkey that has been inoculated. The germ soon multiplies and innumerable bacilli can be discerned in a single drop of blood under the microscope. The sickness comes in spells, between which the germ disappears and the animal seems cured, but the germ soon appears again in great numbers and after several attacks the patient is lucky if it escapes from death.

A MEXICAN LEGEND. It is noon at the old monastery of Vejas, which is situated in the heart of the wild country in northern Mexico and twelve miles from any habitation. The monks are returning from their labors in the garden to chapel. A band of Indians creep up through the long pampas grass, and as the monks come out from prayer, fall upon them and capture them. The aged Father Ignatius is dragged to the burial place and the heavy stone of a vault having been removed, is dropped inside, the stone lid being replaced. The others are imprisoned in the chapel while the Indians sack the monastery and make merry with the Fathers' well stocked cellar. The aged Father prays before a painting of the Christ that is in the vault, and the figure comes to life, and leads him out of his living tomb. Father Ignatius sees the marauders dancing and debauching and plods on his weary way to obtain assistance. He has to cross a river, and Christ appears and directs him to a floating island on which he is quickly borne to the other side. Weary and weak, he endeavors to climb the mountain path, but his strength gives out and he falls exhausted. Again Christ appears, takes him by the hand and leads him over the mountain. Finally he reaches his destination, a hacienda. He tells his story and the Mexican boys are soon in their saddles and on their way to the monastery. They swim the lake on horseback, and arriving at the monastery it is but the work of a few minutes to put the Indians to rout and release the imprisoned monks. Reverently they all turn and fall on their knees and give thanks to Him who gave the Holy Father strength to obtain the help that was so badly needed.

BLACK HEART. Rob Rokers is in prison. He is a noted vagabond and has no chance of escape from the death sentence he deserves. An arrow is shot into his cell bearing a file and a note. This informs him that his companions have formed themselves into a brotherhood for the purpose of revenging themselves upon their enemy, the Chief of the Police. He is in love with a gypsy girl, Sperata, and the brotherhood have decided that Rob Rokers shall carry her off as the price of his freedom. He files the bars and escapes undetected. Then, disguised as a beggar, he follows Sperata on her way home and rushes in and carries her off. Her brother sees him and rushes to the Chief of the Police for help. He requires no urging, and summoning his men he is soon in pursuit through the narrow and badly paved streets. Rokers is captured and Sperata rescued. The Chief of the Police is now more bitter than ever against Rokers, and determines to mete out justice himself. Before a tribunal of masked figures Rokers is forced to give an account of himself. He is finally condemned to death by the judge, who unmasks and shows himself to be the Chief of the Police.

A GAMBLER'S END. Herbert Ralston was a gambler and ne'er-do-well. The picture opens in the parlor of his home in Pennsylvania, where his wife is seen making baby clothes. Ralston soon comes in, and having lost his money gambling, begins to quarrel with his wife. He takes his grip and leaves the house. Along the road he discovers a dead man lying on the edge of the woods who resembles him so much that it even makes the hardened man of the world start. He changes clothes with him and proceeds on his way. The body is found and identified by Mrs. Ralston as her husband. Two months later we see her alone in her home with her fatherless babe. Four years elapse. Mrs. Ralston has married a Duke's ranchman, John Westmere, and they are living on the ranch. It is the child's birthday and she opens the locket round the child's neck and sees for the picture of her father. She teaches her to pray for him. Ralston is still gambling, and is now a faro dealer in a saloon out in Dakota. He kills a cowboy who accused him of cheating and makes his escape. He is quickly pursued by others present and an exciting chase ensues. Soon Ralston, to put his pursuers off the trail, dismounts and striking his horse on the flanks, lets it continue on while he himself takes to the woods, and arriving at Westmere's ranch walks quietly in. As he does so the child, who has stepped from the lap of her stepping mother, toddles to and, looking at him dumbfounded leads him to a chair and kisses him. She recognizes him as her father, and shows him the picture of her mother. Ralston understands. It is his child. Westmere comes in and Ralston explains. Westmere starts towards the bedroom as if to call his wife but Ralston motions that she must never know. He hears the horses of his pursuers outside. He says goodbye to the child, opens the door and falls dead, riddled by the bullets of the friends of the cowboy he had shot.

SELIG POLYSCOPE COMPANY.

THE LADY BARBERS. Every hamlet can boast of one or more public hostelry and most of them find time to name one of them Commercial, such is true of Caseyville. The evening train had just arrived, the hotel was busy attending to the wants of the new arrivals, among which was a real out and out lady tonsorial artist who has made known her intention of opening a barber shop in the quiet and staid village. She is soon in the hands of the real estate man and a bargain struck for a location. The sign is placed in position, and the excitement begins. The novelty of the occasion creates more furore than a detachment of bobbie skirts at a church fair. The village Beau Brummels, married and unmarried, are in line awaiting their turn. The regular shop presents a grave aspect, especially as regards the absence of customers. McGee drops in to tell the old reliable cause of the sudden slump in business.

The news is not received by the ladies of the town with any degree of delight, as they notice their husbands are spending more time and money at the barber shop than usual, some getting shaved 2 or 3 times a day. The new barber is so overwhelmed with business that she sends to the city for more help and in another day the force is increased to four barbers and a lady boot black. The last arrival was too much—the village belles fairly fumed with rage and vowed vengeance. They hold an indignation meeting and resolve upon a plan. In the meantime the regular shop decides to enter into skirted tonsorial competition and accordingly enlists the services of his wife and hangs his sign out to herald the news, but he has not weighed with the charms of the fair sex and while the customers came—like the girl at the church—"turned right around and walked right out again." The suffragette committee by this time had perfected their defense and ordered the old regular to get busy and send for some young men as hair dressers. This is done and proves a bomb in the camp of the invading barbers and all argument on the part of their men was of no avail. Their wives crowded to the old shop and the fair new arrivals are soon on their way.

THE VAMPIRE.—A picture dramatization from Sir Ed Burne Jones' famous painting, with suggestions from that world famous poem by Rudyard Kipling, each conceded a peer in the literary and world of art. This great subject handles deftly the realms of the imaginary inner circle of society.

(Even as you and I)

A fool there was and he made his prayer—
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair—
(We called her the woman who did not care)
But the fool called her his lady fair—
(Even as you and I).

Guy Temple, as "the fool there was" marries his brother's ward, his boyhood sweetheart, Emily. The young husband becomes ensnared in the toils of the Vampire (a destroyer of souls). Clandestine meetings are arranged and the cunning, unscrupulous, satanic actions of the Vampire connels the poor weakling, Temple, to falter and fall before her charms.

John Temple, the other brother, determines to save the young husband when he discovers his perfidy, and to recover the jewels given the Vampire by Guy. In a dream he remembers where he had seen Loie before. She it was who had ruined the life of Emily's father and rendered the then slip of a girl an orphan. Seeking out the brother, John Temple told him Loie was a Vampire, that she had ruined his own wife's father and to quit her under threat of his life. He offers Loie a large sum of money to leave America. But her promise is soon forgotten—her direful work continues, the tightning strands on wrecking souls of mortals. The fool was stripped to his foolish hide—

(Even as you and I).

Which she might have seen when she threw him aside—
(But it isn't on record the lady tried)
So some of him lived but the most of him died—
(Even as you and I)

The young husband's mind is rent his better self and the yawning abyss of the great beyond ever in view.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE TELEPHONE. Hello! Mr. Crimson has gone to the city for the evening, leaving his wife and child at home. While he is away the family cat jumps on the table and knocks over a lamp which sets fire to the house. The wife rescues the child and they are to frightened until their rooms are in a blaze.

The wife is frantic with terror, minding all notions of courage cast off. She is trying to quell the fears of her little one when she suddenly thinks of the telephone calls up the club where her husband is staying tells them of the danger and they telephone the fire department who immediately go out on a call. The engines are racing through the streets followed by the fire chief ambulance and the police reserves. The husband with his club friends in full dress suits, make their way to the street and join the fire fiddlers in their mission of rescue.

The house is a fiery furnace, flame and smoke pouring from every window. The wife appears at one, waves and cries for assistance. Her husband is held back by strong arms from dashing madly into the burning building. The men at the hose are already at work. One brave fellow scales the ladder which has been raised to the window where the unfortified family are located, the mother passes her child to him and he carries it to safety; again ascending the ladder, he plunges through the window and lifts the woman from the floor where she has fallen in a dead faint and carries her down the ladder and places her unharmed in the arms of her husband.

A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT. Two young girls and two young men each in love with the other. The two girls are "Daisies," Daisy White and Daisy Brown. Jack Larkin is in love with Daisy White, and Tom Durkin is in love with Daisy Brown. The young couples plan an elopement and both hit upon the same means of eluding their parents and circumventing the objections of the girls' parents. Miss White agrees to meet Jack at a certain point and by coincidence Miss Brown agrees to meet Tom at the same place.

Each one of the young couples, unknown to the other, dress in long auto coats and goggles. The girls leave notes for their parents and go out to meet their lovers. Daisy White gets to the place of meeting, in the darkness and hurry Tom Durkin comes with his auto, thinks she is Miss Brown, takes her into the car and they speed on their way to the hotel at Marshallton. Jack Larkin now appears, and picks up Daisy Brown, thinking she is Miss White, and makes haste to the Marshallton Hotel. In the meantime Mrs. White and Mr. Brown discover the elopement of their daughters and make a hot chase after the two girls.

Mrs. White reaches the hotel, goes to the room where Miss Brown and Jack have learned their mistake and she finds Daisy Brown instead of her daughter. She makes haste to get on the trail again as soon as possible and decamps. Mr. Brown reaches the hotel finds Miss White with Tom who have also discovered their mistake. Old Brown is chagrined and disappointed at not finding his daughter, resumes the hunt and gets away as quickly as he can.

Jack hears the talk in the next room where Tom and Daisy White are and he and Daisy Brown go in, and the four of them hasten to the nearest church, where they are married.

Just as they are leaving the church they find Mr. Brown and Mrs. White seated on the doorsteps exhausted, defeated in their efforts to prevent the marriages. They forgive the young folks, happily accept the situation and make their ways back home arm in arm.

THE CHILDREN'S REVOLT.—Over-indulged and pampered; restrained and hampered by nurses and the "don'ts" of too much solicitude, the two children of wealthy parents long for freedom and show that they are in many respects quite as natural as most children and a little more unmanageable.

On the train going to the country for the Summer they insist upon indulging themselves in candy, lemonade and everything that comes in sight and then showing an utter disregard for them and less consideration for their parents who cater to their selfish whims.

At the seashore the children are kept under the espionage of nurse, governess and parents who will not permit them out of their sight. Naturally, the children long to play with the other youngsters and whenever they get a chance they break away from their guardians and get together with the other boys and girls on the beach, but they don't escape the vigilance of the nurse and governess, and are soon brought back to the straight and narrow path mapped out for them.

Their little hearts long for freedom and they declare a revolt by getting out of their beds early in the morning, escaping while the nurse is yet asleep. They make a day of it, and the way they do mix in with the children, giving vent to every childish inclination, romping, bathing and boating; it does you good to see it.

When the parents and nurses discover the absence of their cherubs they start out in search of them, the two young ones elude them several times, but they catch up with them just as they are starting out for a row in an old boat they find along the shore. The father rushes into the water, seizes his little girl from the boat and a friend gets the boy. The parents rejoice at the recovery of their dear ones, and they are quickly taken home.

Snugly tucked in bed by the nurse who has no sooner left the room than the two truants get together to discuss the doings of the day and comment on the good time they had and the liberty they enjoyed. They kiss and are soon in the land of nod, dreaming of happy childhood days.

IN THE MOUNTANS OF KENTUCKY. Way up in the mountains of Kentucky, Jake, a moonshiner, lives in a shack with his wife Sally far from the rest of the world, with the least possible chance of being disturbed by the Revenue officers who are constantly on the lookout for illicit stills and distillers of whiskey.

Jake is a typical mountaineer, and his wife "Sal" —well she is a woman whose love for Jake has made her little better than a slave and subject of small consideration for one of Jake's coarse and brutal nature.

Sally's cousin Sue writes that she is not very well and will visit Sally for a change and a rest. She comes to the mountain home and immediately Jake begins to show her marked attention, ignores his wife who becomes extremely jealous, rightly so, and resents the familiarity of her husband and her cousin. She is a vixen and seems to delight in the torture and indignities to which she is subjecting the poor wife.

Driven to a frenzy, Sally betrays Jake to the Sheriff and Revenue officers who arrest him. He tries to strike his frail wife and turns to Sue for sympathy, but she is indifferent about his misfortune, pleased in receiving the attention from one of the officers who is chucking her under the chin and winking at her, and she pays no attention to Jake as he is taken away to jail.

This is a brilliant piece of acting, but is dwarfed by the fury of Sal when she is left alone with her cousin Sue. She turns on the intruder, drives her from the house with inflamed frenzy, hurls her belongings after her and falls exhausted against the door.

A year later Jake is released from prison and makes his way to his mountain home, bent upon killing his wife. Arriving at the cabin he looks in the window and then creeps cautiously through the door, holding a large club in his hand, as he sees his wife sitting in a chair unaware of his presence. Just as he raises the club to strike her, he sees for the first time his infant child which his wife holds tenderly to her bosom. She kisses the child and lifts it up so it looks into its father's face. He drops the cudgel and kneels reverently at his wife's feet, asks her if she can forgive him. She does; his heart is touched and his nature seems transformed and purified.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

A LITTLE FIRE CHIEF. Willie Stone is only six years old, but he yearns to be a fireman. He is much impressed with the parade of firemen he sees in his home town, so much so in fact that he busily devotes his sister on the street to follow the "smoke eaters." But Willie is only a little boy, and despite his enthusiasm he is soon weary and footsore. And his plight, added to his tears, attracts the attention of a kindly fireman who is driving with his engine back to quarters. The lad's discomfort is soon forgotten, for the fireman gives him a ride back to the engine house.

There Willie gravely applies to the captain for a position on the uniformed force, and is jokingly accepted. But he does not see the humor in it and follows the other men to the bunk room, where he takes part in their sports.

But in the midst of the happiest day of his life, an alarm is sounded, and the firemen hastily slide down the pole to their duty. The new fireman, however, is not the kind to be deserted. Grabbing the helmet, the insignia of his office, he follows the others, but is too late to go to the fire. He arrives in time to hold them up on their way back, but is captured by his weeping sister. He does not wish to leave his command, but his friend, Fireman Jack Allen, finally induces him to go on promise that he, Jack, will call later. Perhaps one reason Jack is so accommodating is because he likes sister. Jack pays ardent court to her, and the flame of their affection resists all of young Willie's efforts to put it out. He didn't really mean to try, but he assuredly poured cold water on Jack, for it was in the line of what he regarded as his duty.

IMP

THE DOUBLE.—At the breaking out of the war with Spain, Colonel Robert King is ordered, with his regiment, to Cuba, and donning his uniform he hastens to the home of his sweetheart, Maud Wentworth, to whom he says farewell and at the same time persuades her to accept his engagement ring. At the railroad station from which the troops depart Maud meets the Colonel again and again bids him a tender farewell. As King steps through the gate leading to the train, Joseph Dansby, King's exact counterpart, steps through from the other direction, having just arrived from one of the incoming trains, and, unperceived by Maud, passes out of the station.

Dansby goes at once to a club to which he has been given a card of admission, and making some acquaintances, imbibes a little too freely and leaves the place slightly under the influence of liquor. Outside he meets a home-staying member of the lately departed regiment, who gazes at him in surprise and gives him a military salute. He next meets Maud Wentworth, who is riding in her automobile. She stops the machine in astonishment and asks him to get in with her and explain himself. As he knows nothing whatsoever about his likeness to Colonel King, he is completely mystified by her familiarity and the questions she asks him. However, his blundering replies are regarded by her as the result of his drinking and she takes him to King's home and turns him over to the butler, who escorts him into the house and waits upon him in due form. Dansby, being in a half maudlin condition, has decided to allow affairs to shape themselves as they will and accepts with that spirit everything that comes to him.

Next morning, after Dansby arises, the butler hands him a note addressed to King. On his refusing to open it, the butler, believing him to be still under the influence of liquor, laughingly opens it for him and hands it to him. The note proves to be from Maud, requesting him to call and explain his actions of the day before. Dansby, having been deeply impressed by Maud's beauty, decides to accept the invitation and clear up the mystery at once. But when he arrives, she refuses to accept his explanations and is greatly piqued by his attempts to deny his seeming identity. Her father enters, and believing him to be still affected by his libations of the day before, laughingly advises Maud to pay no attention to his denials for the present. Dansby has, by this time, fallen deeply in love with Maud and after examining the engagement ring on her finger, he points to the photo of King on the table and declares that he wishes he were the lucky man. She insists that he is and kisses him and he, unable to resist her charms any longer, returns her kiss with interest.

Matters drift along in this manner for some time, for, Dansby being unable to break away from the alluring spell which Maud has cast about his heart, makes no further attempts to reveal himself.

In the meantime, Colonel King and his regiment have arrived in Cuba and fighting has begun. One day while riding among the outposts, King is ambushed and fatally wounded and, falling from his horse, is carried to his quarters and dies in the arms of one of his friends, a surgeon.

At home, Maud receives a newspaper clipping announcing his death, and after reading it she faints away. Dansby enters and noticing her condition, picks up the clipping and reads it, then quietly leaves the house, after summoning her maid to her assistance. Returning home, he writes Maud a note, stating that as she at last knows the truth, he is going away forever.

Maud, upon reading his note, realizes that she loves Dansby as well as she ever loved King, and hastily going to Dansby, she begs him to remain to her side, and he, of course, remains.

FORTUNE'S WHEEL. Two brothers, equally well off financially, have a bitter quarrel, and, being separated by a mutual friend, they part, each resolving never to speak to the other again.

After the lapse of time, one of the brothers, having met with serious reverses on the stock market, becomes desperately poor, while the other has risen to be the head of a large manufacturing concern. The poor brother's family, being in need of food, his wife begs him, for their little daughter's sake, to ask aid of his wealthy brother. He refuses at first, but finally gives in and goes to his brother's factory and implores assistance. The rich brother, being ashamed of the relationship, takes him aside and not only refuses aid, but orders him to leave the premises at once. Returning home, helpless and hopeless, he receives a special delivery letter informing him that some of his mining stock he had believed worthless had taken a sudden rise. With the letter was enclosed a check for a handsome amount. The wheel of fortune had taken another turn.

The same turn of the wheel sent the rich brother on the downward path, through the gradual failure of his concern, and thus, after another lapse of years, the once poor brother becomes the rich brother, while the formerly wealthy brother becomes the poor brother. Situations are reversed.

The poor brother now lives with his family in miserable quarters, and, unable to meet his landlord's demand for rent, faces eviction into the street. Finally, yielding to his wife's entreaties, he in turn goes to beg assistance of his brother, calling upon him at his handsome residence. He is met with the same spirit that he had exhibited towards his brother on the former occasion, is reminded of his own heartlessness under like circumstances and ordered into the street. Heartbroken, he totters from the house.

The daughter of the rich brother has overheard her father and uncle talking and as soon as the latter leaves the room she rushes in, and gently chiding the former for his cruelty to his own flesh and blood, begs him to forgive the past. Not waiting, however, for his reply, she dashes out of the house, and overtaking her uncle, she persuades him to return.

The brothers meet again, and yielding to the importunities of his young daughter, the wealthy brother agrees to extend aid to the unfortunate one. The latter attempts to seize the other's hand and kneel in gratitude, but the other will not allow it, but shoves him back. Then, after a brief mental struggle, the rich man offers his hand to the poor man, and the two once more become brothers in spirit as well as blood.

A WIDOW AND HER CHILD.—When a man dies and leaves behind a handsome and charming widow, trouble is sure to come, and when there happens to be a child in the case, there is a complication of troubles.

Mrs. Bell, the widow, is being ardently wooed by two men, and each swears to win her at any cost. They both go about it in different ways.

Arthur Will's, seeing that the widow favors his rival's suit, and firmly convinced of the old adage (all is fair in love and war) kidnaps the child and secretes it in an old farm house. Mrs. Bell is in despair, and all her pleadings are vain. She finally consents to marry the abductor, so that she may obtain her little darling.

John Winn, his love dream shattered, almost goes mad, and unable to fight against fate, he wanders in the country. Dame Fortune, however, comes to his rescue, for in his aimless roamings he comes across the old farm house and the kidnapped child. He acts quickly; takes the child and restores it to its mother just in time to prevent her wedding to Arthur Willis.

John Winn is indeed a winner, for he wins the widow's hand and the happiness he has craved for.

THE HAND OF PROVIDENCE.—Entering one of his favorite haunts, one night, he directed his attentions to one of the girls whose companion resented the intrusion and a terrific battle followed. He was carried home on a stretcher and nursed by Grace until he was able to leave the house. Not satisfied with the lesson received, he thirsted for revenge and began a search for the man who had caused his injuries. A chance meeting in the same cafe, an instant of deliberation and the deed was done. When the bartender came in from the street, where the wounded man had staggered, and cried that he was dead, horror was depicted on every face. Then the police came and led their man away.

Grace heard the news and fainted. She lay between life and death for weeks, cared for by the kindly doctor-friend of her girlhood days. The man went to prison for the balance of his natural life, so the judge decided. But the masons who built the walls of Sing Sing failed to build them strong enough to withstand the cunning of the crook and criminal. Some of the men escaped, among them Grace's husband. He eludes his pursuers by changing clothes with a man who was killed by a stray bullet and goes into hiding. The guards carry off the supposed convict's dead body and the newspapers apprise Grace of the story.

Meanwhile the doctor has been caring for her with the devotion born of long friendship and a love which has always been silent. Grace consents to marry him when she realizes she is free. They live happily and a child comes to bless their union.

A thief steals into their home in the quiet of the night and is caught by the doctor. Recognition follows. Two men fight at the door of death. The child hears their struggle and steps a passing policeman in time to prevent a crime. The thief escapes followed by a shower of bullets as the officer shoots through the doorway. Grace, rushing into the room hears from her husband that a burglar has been shot but she never knows his real identity.

YANKEE

THE CASE OF THE MISSING HEIR. Raymond Brown, financier, dies in the prime of his life after amassing a snug fortune, leaving his wife and infant son the bulk of his wealth, the major portion of which is willed to the infant heir, conditional with his living until he reaches of age. Should the child die before the time, a cousin, Ralph, shall come into the fortune.

The latter, through bad associations, has degenerated into a worthless character, a leech on society. Involved heavily in debt, he determines to make way with the child and secure a fortune. Plans are carefully laid to kidnap the heir during a steamship voyage up the Hudson River.

Nell Pierce has just successfully closed up a hard case and is taking a well-earned vacation. She happens to book passage on the same vessel on which Mrs. Brown, the baby and the scheming cousins are sailing.

Suspicious action on the part of Brown and an accomplice puts Nell on her guard and she watches the pair but does not comprehend their purpose until too late and the child is spirited away. A chase then follows in which many exciting incidents unfold. Nell gives up all thought of a vacation and takes up a slender clew through which she finally brings the cousin to justice.

The daring girl detective is forced to travel dangerous underground passages and many times comes within an ace of losing her life but finally rescues the infant heir and restores him to his distracted mother.

THE WOODSMAN.—Everyone, except John Carter himself, knew that Ann Hunt, the young wife the gray-haired woodsman had taken unto himself, had married him merely for a home, and now that their humble little cabin was getting to be an old story Ann not only became careless about her household duties but her own appearance as well.

Her interest in both suddenly revived, however, when her husband brought home a young stranger, whom he had rescued from a deserted shack. This shack, wherein the stranger had taken shelter from a storm and fallen asleep—so he declared—had been struck by a tree that the woodsman and his partner had been felling.

Under the fatherly care of John Carter, who actually gave up his own bed and the better part of his meals to his new acquaintance, the stranger grew rapidly stronger and was soon able to be about.

The young wife, however, would not hear of his departure. This stranger was to her the one bright spot in the universe and she meant to keep him by her side at any cost.

One day as John and Bert Hale were busily engaged in felling a tree, Sheriff King and his deputy appeared. They had heard rumors of the invalid and believed him to be the man for whom they were searching—a highwayman and cattle rustler, known as "Gentleman Jim."

The sheriff's supposition was all too true—for, as the woodsman glanced at the picture of "Gentleman Jim," they beheld the face of their young stranger.

Hale would have at once communicated his knowledge had not the older woodsman plucked him by the sleeve. Unfortunately, his action had been observed by the keen-eyed deputy, who, calling his chief down the path, quickly imparted this latest piece of evidence. No sooner had the officer of the law disappeared from view than John threw down his axe and ran breathlessly to his cabin, intent upon apprising his guest of the danger hovering over him.

As the woodsman entered the kitchen, however, the sight which met his eyes froze him to the spot. The highwayman was standing with his back to the door, and in his arms was John Carter's young wife. Then, as the husband glanced around, his eyes fell upon his shot-gun; but, as he raised it to take aim, "Gentleman Jim" gently put the woman from him, and the woodsman realized that this scene had been of her making.

Quietly he closed the door between them; rolled up his blanket and, after leaving her half the money his bag contained, he stole softly out and walked resolutely away.

Long after the sheriff had taken the highwayman into custody and Ann had stood gazing out into the night wondering why he did not return—the woodsman was still walking resolutely away.

THE TRUTH REVEALED.—A group of merry girls, carrying bundles of washing, are on their way to the stream, when one of the number, Mary, leaves the rest and meets a young farmer, John. This action is observed by another washer, Kate, who, her jealousy ill-concealed, watches the young couple. Later, as all the washers are busy by the stream, the young squire accompanied by a friend, rides up. Dismounting, he perceives Mary's pretty face and graceful manners, and endeavors to kiss her. As she struggles to free herself, the squire's friend quickly snap-shots the scene. Kate has been a witness of the affair, and, following the squire, she tells him of a way to be revenged. Then hastening to John, she informs him that his sweetheart has been flirting with the young squire. John is furious, and going to the squire pleads with him, but is only mocked and scorned. Meeting Mary, John reproaches her for her faithlessness, and refusing to listen to her explanation, leaves her. A few days later, the young squire, together with his friend, and some ladies attends the village fete. John also attends, and infuriated at the treatment meted out to him by the squire, denounces him in the presence of all the merry-makers. But the friend shows John the snap-shot of Mary struggling to free herself from the squire's embrace, and he quickly realizes how he has misjudged his country lassie. Making his way to Mary's house he asks her forgiveness, which is granted him, and both the lovers grasp the photographer's hand, thanking him for having brought them together again.

BILL AS A BOXER.—Here we have Bill aspiring to excel in the "noble art," and the ultimate consequences of his temerity. Bill reads in the paper a notice to the effect that a celebrated champion boxer is challenging anyone to knock him out, the reward offered being $4,000. Bill determines to secure this large sum and repairs to the champion's house, where he expresses his wish to the boxer's manager. The champion who is a huge colored man appears, and Bill gets one or two blows in. But when the black waves his hand Bill collapses, and finally leaves hurriedly. He very quickly gets into a scrape with two gendarmes who give him a very rough time of it, banging him about like a shuttlecock. After spending some time in a cell, Bill is released and promptly proceeds to practice in the privacy of his own home. He draws a rough sketch of a human fact on the wall, and, donning a pair of gloves, makes a mighty punch at the face. But, alas! he brings the wall down, and the film closes upon a scene of wild confusion.

THE LAST STRAW.—Ned Singleton, a country boy, leaves his country home to seek his fortune in the city, and trods a thorny, rocky path. But the folks at home, and the little maid waiting for his triumphant return must not know of it, so Ned grimly strives and struggles. One day, hungry, weary, exhausted, he falls fainting in front of a cafe, and a cafe hanger-on assists him; gives him food and money. The young man, upon hearing the other's tale of woe, tells him he will give him an opportunity to make money—and literally means what he says, for he is no other than the famous leader of a band of counterfeiters. The Badger leads Ned to his den and there tells him what his work is to be. As Ned realizes the nature of the work he is to do his manliness and integrity rebel. As he refuses to become an accomplice the other forces a counterfeit $20 bill into his hand; and just then the officers force the door and Ned is caught with the goods. He protests his innocence, but other innocent men have gone to Sing Sing—and Ned is one of the number. One day the Governor calls to inspect the prison, and feeling the weight of his coat hands it to Ned, who carries himself to freedom with it. The tide turns and he prospers. He sends for his little country sweetheart who does not know of the past events, and they are married. Then one day the Badger, discharged from prison, meets him and noticing his prosperous appearance, demands money. The money is given. Again he calls, again and yet again. He torments and pesters Ned until one day the latter driven to despair when he finds the other waiting in his home, attacks him and for the first time in his life commits a real crime as he sniffs out the worthless life of the badger.

THE WAY OF THE WEST.—Bess Allen does not know whether she loves Ben Crosby or Joe Darnton, and when they call and propose to her at the same time, she laughingly refuses both of them. The rest of the cowboys, led by Bess's father, give the boys the laugh, and to conceal their mortification, Joe asks Ben and the crowd to adjourn to the bar and wash down their disappointment.

Ben returns when he deems it opportune and renewing his offer of proposal to Bess follows it up with impetuous zeal. He will not take no for an answer, but seizes her and kisses her passionately. The girl struggles ineffectually and indignantly strikes him across the mouth. Regaining the mastery of his feelings he humbly accepts his dismissal and takes his leave, unconsciously clasping in his hand a strand of ribbon which he has torn from her throat in the embrace.

Returning to the saloon he is charged by Joe of having taken undue advantage by sneaking off to renew his suit. A word test ensues which results in a fistic brawl. Thinking he had killed Joe, Ben decamps to the wigwam of friendly Indians, where he remains in hiding.

Bess's father, incensed over the fight about his daughter, informs her of it. Having become aware of the reality that with the blow she had struck Ben, she had actually loved him, Bess now repairs to the saloon filled with alarm. Instead of finding Joe dead, she is confronted with fresh accusations from all the cowboys including Joe, and with disgust, and outraged pride she returns home.

In a spirit of revenge Joe entices her to a shack with a decoy note purporting to come from Ben and then compels her to fight for her honor, which she indeed does as only honest, hardy women of the West can. However, she is no match for the man, and at the crucial moment smashes the window with a keg and leaps from the second story into the arms of Ben Crosby, the man she loves. Ben has been warned of the machinations against her by his Indian friend who scented mischief brewing and brought him to the rescue.

Fearing the result of his deed and having truly repented, Joe comes out of the shack to give himself up expecting to find Bess dead from the fall, but when he, is apprised of the true situation, he humbly begs pardon of both her and Ben which is granted by them, for these big-hearted folk of the West do not harbor a grudge no matter how severe the provocation.

Bess's father and the cowboys arrive also and escort the young pair home amid the cheers and firing of guns, and poor, repentent Joe joins them.

GINHARA; OR FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH.—Ginhara, daughter of the King of Thebes, having fallen into an ambush, is rescued by Alberich, a barbarian chief. In gratitude and love, Ginhara, before a great assemblage of her people, chooses her deliverer, the brave Alberich, to be her husband. Haltar, a rejected lover of the Princess, enraged at the union between his beloved and Alberich, declares war on the kingdom of Ginhara, and in a fierce battle, Alberich is slain.

Ginhara is prostrate with grief, but she resolves before she leaves this world, to revenge the death of her dear husband. Accordingly, adorned in her richest jewels, she seeks the camp of Haltar, who, upon her arrival, conceives the idea that Ginhara has been won over by his daring exploits. Ginhara keeps the Prince in ignorance as to the real motive of her errand a sufficient length of time, and then is successful in administering a dose of poison to her hated enemy. This done, she considers her mission in this life ended, her one desire is to seek her departed loved one. Without delay, then, she partakes of a poisoned fruit, and expires.

Her body, when discovered, is laid in the chamber where her husband sleeps the sleep eternal, and amidst the reverend sorrow of their people, the two, reunited in death, are borne to their last, long resting place.

THE DEVIL'S BILLIARD TABLE.—Mr. X is a great billiard player, and is quite proud of his accomplishments in this direction. He never misses to challenge any of his friends, and, of course, never fails to come out victorious. As time goes on, his friends grow tired of being continually beaten, and besides, they are goaded by the knowledge, that despite their best efforts, they are unable to humiliate the proud Mr. X. At about this time, Mephistopheles happens along and tells the young friends of Mr. X, that if they will give him their souls, he will, in turn, challenge the mighty billiard player, and beat him at his own game. So keen has become the desire to avenge themselves upon their adversary that they make the compact.

Accordingly Mephistopheles challenges Mr. X, who readily accepts, feeling confident, of course, of victory. He does not play very long, however, before he realizes that he is playing against some greater power than himself and all too soon, he is beaten by the artful wiles of his enemy. The failure is a great humiliation to our friend X, but it teaches him not to abuse his talent, as he has done in the past.

THE LURE OF THE CITY.—An old man, weary of the city's strife and disappointments, has taken himself with his baby boy to the mountain fastness from which heights he can scan the world below and still remain unseen and unknown. His books he has taken and some small things. There, alone, with none to distract, he breathes the peace begot by seclusion. With patient care he moulds the mind and character of his son as he grows into manhood. Contentment reigns supreme in the mountain home. The old man as near the gates of heaven as the world will permit. The boy, a giant of muscle and mind, is free and content, dreaming of naught beyond his little world, the well of his affections filled with the love of his father.

What is it that suddenly attracts and absorbs his interest in the far distance away across the valley below? A city has been rising, until now the tall chimneys with their black smoke can be plainly seen through the early morning light. As we shall know this day, he holds in his hands a book. He reads intently and then with yearning gaze has turned to look toward the distant city. Anon he reads upon the page: "The city is a place for strong men, for there a man must do a man's work." He rises and expanding himself in his strength, repeats aloud he has just read. With hasty steps he is soon before the venerable father. When and where he tells the boy his desire to go to the city, he is sorrowful, warns him of its strife and its pitfalls, and counsels him not to go. The boy is determined. He leaves with his father's blessing, a small bag of gold, and prayers for his safety and return. We see him wending his way down the mountain side, his father and his faithful dog watching him sorrowfully, from above.

He enters the city in course of time and the many strange spectacles that assail him, reveal to him a new world. The first is a drunken creature; he staggers and falls helpless in the gutter. Our hero, not knowing the quality of the "Wine when it is red in the cup," runs with human impulse to succor a brother. A lazy policeman approaches, throws the boy aside and without a word drags the creature off to jail.

In wonder at all he sees, he reaches a factory. He applies for work. The men treat him roughly, laugh at his grotesque appearance, and he being a stalwart and strong man they are in fear of competition from him, so jeer at him and are driving him off when the owner arrives with his daughter, who, struck with the wild and rugged child of nature, saves him from the crowd. He is put to work. Then follows a series of rows and riots because of this outsider coming and doing three men's work. The crisis comes in a general strike instigated by a bully of a foreman who had aspired to the hand of the owner's daughter. They demand to see the boss' "union card." In the fight that follows the owner expires from the excitement and shock. The girl is left an orphan.

Some weeks later the inevitable has happened. The girl and the mountain boy are in love. She now looks to him as her natural protector and her whole life's interest is wound up in him. The bully foreman has constantly nursed his wrath until finally unable longer to control it, he plots to assassinate the intruder. The girl overhearing the scheme, warns her lover and admonishes him to fly. He refuses to go unless she accompany him. In a spirit of self sacrifice she consents to go, and together they flee into the foothills, followed by an angry and bloodthirsty mob. By a ruse the mob is outwitted and the lovers escape.

The mountain boy takes the girl to his father's home, and when the old man learns that the girl has saved the boy's life he receives her with open arms.

Some days have passed and the mountain boy is awaiting for the girl to suggest her return to the city. Finally, unable to hold back his love, he asks her if he shall escort her back home. She turns to him and answers, "No; your world is my world; your home is my home. We will stay here together on the heights always." Love has conquered and love and peace again reign in the mountain home.

NEW SLIDES

For the Following Songs—JUST OUT

Oh, That Boog-a-boo Man
Any Place Is Heaven When You are with the Girl You Love
When June rolls around with its roses, I'll roll around with a ring.
The longer we're together, the harder it is to part.
Maybe you're not the only one who loves me.
Sweet Red Roses.
Now She's Anybody's Girlie.
Love Dreams.
O-O-Ohio.
Oh, You Dream.
You Stole My Gal.
I'm Just Pinin' For You.
Beloved.
There's a Girl up in the Moon.
On Mobile Bay
He got Right up on the Wagon
Fifty Years Ago
Love Me Again

Special Imp Bulletin!

The prize winning scenario of the recent St. Louis Times contest, in which hundreds of writers submitted manuscripts, will be produced by the Imp Company as one of its regular releases on Monday, November 14. Read the accompanying clipping from the St. Louis Times and it will give you an idea of the treat in store for you. Advertise this film as the "prize winner" and tell your exchange you simply must have it at the earliest possible moment. The title of the release is

"The Double"

(PRIZE WINNER IN CONTEST)

It is a plot that is not only bound to command your respect, but one which is rich in dramatic situations remarkably well handled by the Imp stock company. Look up the synopsis elsewhere in this issue and then begin ding-donging at your exchange till you get "The Double." If your exchange can't furnish it, write to us. We'll give you the names of exchanges that will! Released Monday, Nov. 14th. Remember the date and the title!

"Fortune's Wheel"

Released Thursday, November 17

Here is another "Imp," typically high class in plot, acting, photography and every little detail. If any other manufacturers were producing films in the same class as "Imp," there might be some reason why your exchange should furnish you but one "Imp" per week. But, knowing as you do, that "Imps" are far and away the best that are being marketed right now, you ought to get TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK if you have to keep switching from one exchange to another till you find the right one!

MRS. CLEMENS WINS THE TIMES SCENARIO PRIZE

Her Sketch, "The Double," Selected Over Those of Hundreds of Others.

$100 IS AWARDED TO HER

Imp Company to Produce Play, Using Its Most Talented Actors.

Mrs. Katharine Boland Clemens, daughter of one of St. Louis' first families, and wife of Dr. J. R. Clemens, has been declared the winner of the scenario contest and the $100 offered by The St. Louis Times for the best moving picture play. The judges of the contest awarded the prize to Mrs. Clemens over several hundred contestants. The Independent Moving Picture Company of New York will produce the play immediately.

"The Double" is the title of the successful scenario. The Imp Company will employ the most proficient moving picture players in the United States in producing "The Double," according to their agreement with The Times. The films will be distributed to every village, town and city in the United States where the cinematograph is an institution.

The scenario attracted the attention of the judges because of the care and precision with which the various scenes were worked out. So nearly perfect was the technique of "The Double" that it will be produced as it was written. The action of the playlet, according to the judges, is developed from situation to situation in a remarkably interesting manner.

Motion Photography and the Mirror Screen

The Two Greatest Inventions in the Amusement Producing World

Motion Photography's Pre-eminent State of Perfection
is Due to the Invention of the MIRROR SCREEN.

WHY THE MIRROR SCREEN HAS PRODUCED SUCH GREAT RESULTS

The projection of pictures on the Mirror Screen means that you are working in the science of light as glass. There is no substance used which is so important in the science of light as glass. Glass attracts light, reflects light, condenses, projects transmits, multiplies and magnifies light. Glass is transparent or translucent, according as it may be treated or used in practice. In fact, glass is the best agent to transmit light in the many ways known. Therefore, a Mirror Screen is the most perfect screen that can be made for motion pictures It beautifies still life, increases the detail of the picture; in fact, it elaborates that which the camera has recorded when the film was first photographed. Always the best investment for any theatre. Get wise before your competitor does.

This Letter Tells the Story

FRANKTON, IND., Oct. 17, 1910.

CHARLES L. KIEWERT CO.,
New York.

Dear Sirs:—I received your samples of BIO Carbons I asked for. I tried them and I certainly was surprised when I lit them and threw the light on the screen—so different from what I had been using—clear, bright and clean—they make the ghost disappear and bring out the dull photography and really do more than you claim for them. They are the carbons. I have used all kinds and makes and am sorry I did'nt know about them before. Any operator makes a mistake by not adopting the BIO Carbon above all.

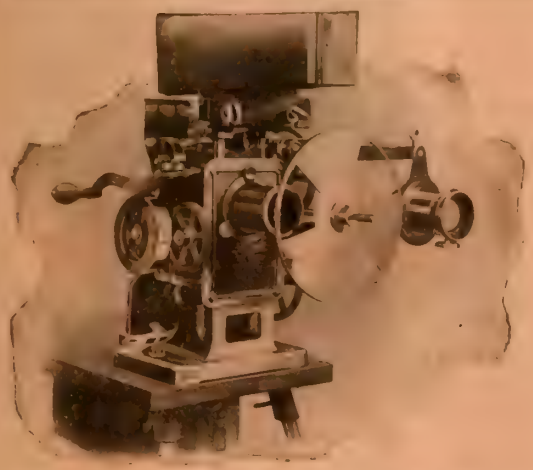
Power's Cameragraph No. 6



The Perfect Motion Picture Machine

THE most desirable features in a moving picture machine are steady, flickerless pictures and substantial construction. The former draws patrons to your theatre. The latter is an insurance against breakdown and big repair bills.

These features are found only in Power's Cameragraph No. 6.

The Machine Without a Pinwheel and Star Wheel

"I have used your No. 6 machine for the last 6 months and the picture it shows is absolutely flickerless; in general it shows a picture as near perfect as could be expected. It is also a machine built to wear, and that is what every exhibitor, manager and operator is looking for."

Dated Oct. 1st/10 (Signed) BERNARD R. SIEVE
Star Theatre, 5 Tremont Row, Boston, Mass.

"I have used practically all the leading American machines and one foreign machine. It has been my experience that your Cameragraph No. 6 is the machine that gives the most satisfaction in every way. It is absolutely flickerless. It gives the longest wear and is the most durable."

Dated Sept. 15/10 (Signed) WM. M. WALTERS.

RELEASED TUESDAY, NOV. 22

For All the Year—AND Thanksgiving Time!

A Thanksgiving Surprise

deals with the transformation of a young, useless society snob into a splendid man of the world and shows how the change was accomplished. This was the ruse of his uncle's and the sweet, pure love of an humble flower girl, that the youth strove to win. While succeeding, he shook off the shackles of class feeling and redeemed himself in his wealthy uncle's eyes and—best of all—in his own. AS A STORY THAT GLORIFIES THAT GRAND AMERICAN VIRTUE—DEMOCRACY—THIS WILL CAPTIVATE AMERICAN AUDIENCES. IT MAKES IRRESISTIBLE APPEAL TO THAT MAIN SUPPORT OF THE MOVING PICTURE—THE GREAT AMERICAN MIDDLE CLASS.

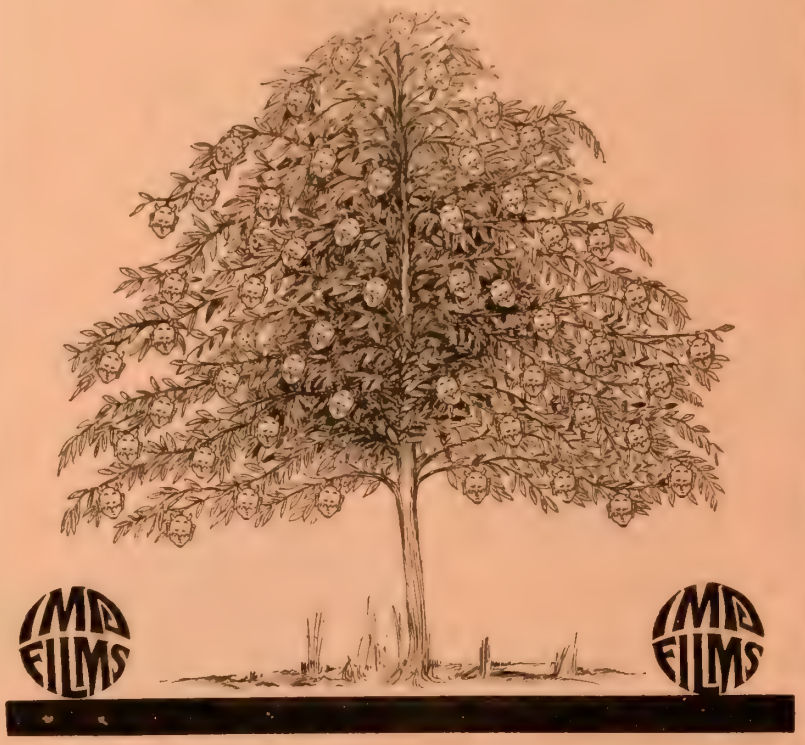
"If you wish the best fruit
"In the garden of films,
"Imps are the peaches to pick!"



The Imp Thanksgiving release on Monday, November 21, will, we believe, be the most enjoyable of its kind ever produced around holiday time. It is calculated to appeal to the Thanksgiving mood of the people—a rich combination of pathos and humor. It is entitled and deals entirely with the efforts of a young couple to supply themselves with their Thanksgiving meal. It's a simple theme around which to construct a playlet, but please take notice how splendidly it has been done. Three days after this film is released we will offer a rural drama entitled and we know your audiences will enjoy every blessed foot of it. It involves a country couple, a city couple and a grand mix-up of their love affairs. It has a happy-forever-after ending of course. This will be released Thursday, November 24th. Meanwhile, are you going to adopt our suggestion about demanding TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK from your exchange? If you really want IMPS, you'll have to help us see that you GET THEM.

Their Day of Thanks

The New Calcium Light Outfit

The Initial Cost is Less than that of any other and it can be Maintained for Less.

$25.00 Complete with Burner

At last a calcium gas making outfit that produces the maximum light at the minimum expense can be had. The "Perfecto" solves the problem. In this light you get more gas pressure than in any other calcium light, hence a more powerful light, and at less expense because of its generating process. It is the simplest of calcium lights and naturally the best; is non-explosive, never gets out of order, and complete weighs only 15 pounds. There are no frills about the "Perfecto." It's just a plain calcium gas making outfit that produces the powerful light that you must have, and above all at the least possible cost. Every exchange and dealer in lighting outfits should handle this light, and every exhibitor who is forced to use a calcium light should use this one. It's the cheapest in every way, and the best. Write for more particulars, or will ship C. O. D. upon receipt of deposit. Price $25.00 complete with burner.

NOTICE.

The new Western offices of the Moving Picture World, Rooms 307-309, Post building, 160 Washington street, Chicago, are now ready to receive World readers visiting Chicago. Mr. John M. Bradlet, Western representative of the World, will extend to every one a cordial welcome. They will find a complete file of manufacturers' catalogues and a bureau of information on films, theater construction, materials and supplies. They will also find desks and stationery for their correspondence, the services of a lady stenographer and a polite messenger boy to act as their guide or go their errands. We invite every exhibitor or person interested in motion pictures to make our Western office their headquarters when visiting Chicago.

Announcements.

The long promised MOTION PICTURE HANDBOOK, by F. H. Richardson, is now ready for delivery. The price is $1.50, postage free. Several hundred mail orders have already been filled and anyone who has ordered and paid for a copy and has not yet received it should notify us at once.

The WORLD'S staff of editors are now at work on another and more comprehensive work, a YEAR BOOK OF MOTION PICTURES. The first volume of this projected annual will contain a historical review of the growth of the industry. We invite contributions from any of our readers who can furnish authentic historical data or articles of scientific interest. Technical articles dealing with the various branches of the industry are also solicited and will be paid for according to their value. The publishers thereby hope to be able to issue in the near future a standard reference book and guide to the photoplay, for which, to use a trite expression, there is an aching void.

Arrangements are now being made for two or more CASH PRIZE COMPETITIONS that will be of much more than pecuniary interest to our readers. The first of these is briefly referred to on page 1166, this week's issue, and is intended to encourage a more general use of the uniformed attendant at the photoplay. Our Chicago representative is now completing the details of this competition, which will be announced in due course.

The second competition will be more far-reaching and will interest every reader of the paper, but more especially the operator. The prize list will be much larger, but the details of the competition are so heavy that we will not be able to make public the conditions until the month of December.

Beginning next week a new department will be inaugurated in the pages of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, viz., "MUSIC FOR THE PICTURE." This department will be conducted by Mr. Clarence E. Sinn, the director of the much lauded orchestra in the Orpheum Theater, Chicago.

A series of valuable articles on the "TECHNIQUE OF THE PHOTOPLAY," by George R. Craw, is in type, and also articles on "THE ACTING IN THE SILENT DRAMA," by C. H. Claudy, all of which will appear at an early date.

The Picture "Marking Time."

We have before us a five-page letter from an exhibitor, or rather from one of the members of a firm of exhibitors, who own or control a large circuit of theaters. The letter was sent to us for publication, but as it sounds such a pessimistic note and the writer refuses the use of his name, we will merely quote therefrom. Our excuse for doing this is that the letter is evidently written by a man of brains, a man who can think and reason and who is apparently serious in his deductions and assertions, some of which contain much food for reflection.

He starts out by advocating an "open market" as the only effective means of safeguarding and promoting the welfare of the motion picture. This is open to debate. His argument is that an open market would put the manufacturers on their mettle, competition would be on the lines of quality only, and a decided improvement would immediately be observed. He says that this would result in greatly increased sales for some of the manufacturers, while it would eventually lead to the elimination of the tyro who was now reaping an unfair harvest due to the present regulations of the two trust factions controlling the source of supply.

It does seem to us unreasonable that a poor film should have the same sales and the same showing as a production of merit, equally so it is unreasonable, nay unjust, that a manufacturer who makes liberal use of money and brains should be governed by the same trade restrictions as the man who can see no farther than the ten cents per foot at the least possible expenditure. This is one argument in favor of the open market.

We cannot help thinking that herein lies the cause for the stagnation or lowering of quality to which our correspondent refers at length. He cites the fact that the call for Biograph is not what it was some months ago and that some of Selig's releases, such as "The Ghost of the Oven" and "O, You Skeleton" and others are far inferior to what he was producing two, three and even four years ago.

Our correspondent also says that the demand for Pathe European films has fallen very low while the call for their American subjects has increased, the Edison product, except an occasional feature film, fails to draw, others are at a standstill, while the only licensed manufacturer whose productions have steadily advanced in public favor to any marked extent has been Lubin. This tallies with our own observations and inquiries and it points to a condition which ought to, and no doubt does, demand the serious attention of every manufacturer.

We will not devote any more space at this time to this exhibitor's letter or quote further therefrom than to say that he is exhibiting licensed films and draws a very uncomplimentary parallel between the program he received from his exchange on Wednesday, November 2, and that shown the same day by a neighbor of his who runs Independent films. We will not mention the numbers on his program, some of which were past releases, but we think it justice to the Ambrosio people to say that the Independent exhibitor was featuring "The Slave of Carthage" and the sensation that this magnificent film created among the spectators so contrasted with our correspondent's weak program that he seriously considers featuring vaudeville in a theater that has hitherto featured the picture exclusively.

Is It to be Forward or Retreat?

The moving pictures are progressing! The moving pictures are not progressing! This seems a paradoxical statement, yet true, nevertheless. Just where each of these contrary statements is true is simply a matter of relationship to location and conditions.

The Moving Pictures Are Progressing.

Everywhere, where there is a right knowledge of their value and possibilities, the many and varied predictions of the great future of the cinematograph are being rapidly realized. In educational quarters not only are the possibilities of the instrument acknowledged, but its immediate power is used as far as it can possibly be utilized in imparting knowledge; its only limitation being found in the negative to be shown under the second heading of this article. The magazines of the day, American and European, are constantly dwelling upon the higher uses of the moving picture, many of these writings from recognized authorities now speak of the moving pictures as one of the necessary accessories of the every-day life of people everywhere. It has taken its place with the telegraph, telephone, steam power and electricity. The question of its possibilities is now never referred to, its capabiliites are never questioned. It is an established instrument of world-wide necessity. Educators are calling for the fulfillment of promises made, and demanding that those responsible for the production of subjects shall comply with a complete response to their own predictions. In the commercial world the demand for the practical uses of the cinematograph have exceeded the most sanguine forecastings; uses to which purpose even the wisest prepared for have been surpassed, and a further call is made for the commercializing of the advantages of the moving picture as a new factor in trade. Institutional uses of the moving picture are to-day as general as a decade ago was the universal stereopticon, to which must be added the greater powers of the former over the latter. In the world of pleasure there is but one note everywhere. "More and better" is the cry. Keep pace with the possibilities; the crude experimental days are passed; graduate from school of learning into the professional of the universal teacher! Thus, the great progress is marked and emphatic, leading to the analysis of the situation as to why and where:

Moving Pictures Are Not Progressing.

Acting as a drag upon the wheels of this great progress is the insufficient growth to a higher plane of the film producers. With a sameness week after week. The "usual thing," the "daily change," the limited subject measured off like tape at a drygoods store, by the yard. The only sign of progress is where an occasional religious picture, or scientific exhibit from France, suggests that someone is alive somewhere.

Strange to say, the recent use of commercial pictures were upon positive orders from those desiring them for exhibition purposes. Frequent visits to moving picture theaters have made so familiar the characters in the various plays that they can easily be followed from one subject to another until one feels a strange fulfillment of the truism that "familiarity breeds contempt." The monotonous subjects, too, are now growing tiresome—Indian, melodrama, comedy, melodrama, comedy, Indian—simply "ringing the changes" with the everlasting, ever present, stupid, sickening "illustrated songs," often vulgar, always badly sung by a cracked voice and by a class of "hangers on" that are bringing moving picture places into evil repute. Continuous, consistent, catering to a depraved taste in love scenes, like a circulating library of dime novels of the worst kind of a Laura Jean Libby style; are the present flow of the hundreds of feet of film, so that love is becoming a sickening sentimentalist emotion of a type almost impossible to conceive.

Food for yellow journalism is much of the non-progressive production of to-day. The last year has seen little or no advance along these lines, the pictures have not grown with purposes, and there is non-progressive element in moving picture work. This state of things leads to a prediction, and here let it be said that this prediction is based upon the common history of almost all movements the success of which depends upon growth. It is an invariable rule that the pioneers of any movement pass away, and the mighty impetus necessary to bring to a great conclusion is carried on by others who take up the work where their predecessors had either failed or halted —for to halt is to invite failure where progress is concerned. Before long we shall see springing up around us in the moving picture business mighty concerns, whose first aim will be to produce nothing of a kind now upon the market, and which in ten years will not only be obsolete, but the wonder of the age that they were ever tolerated, the only excuse for their existence being made that they were the vagaries of infancy. The next aim of the coming progressive moving picture makers will be the reproduction of the highest possible plays, subjects, and themes; so that while losing none of its present popularity among the people it shall rank equal with the demands of the theater, institutions, or schools of the highest order possible. Of the large number of moving picture firms to-day—and there are many good ones—only those will survive who wisely catch the progressive spirit and answer the calls and demands made from every quarter of the globe for the high standard the movement justifies and, "death from natural causes" will be the verdict of any who are deaf to the call. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD has always believed in and predicted this future and is at the present time doing all in its power to keep abreast this mighty progress, hoping also to carry with it both its clients and readers that together they may share the fruits of those earlier labors, believing that those who have been the pioneers should, if possible, also be those who should share in the glories of success.

The Arbiter.

To our thinking there is no more interesting part of any journal, whatever be its character, than its correspondence pages. Every responsible journal features this department. Every editor of a journal (we speak by the light of considerable experience in this matter) finds compensation for the disappointments or discouragements in his work—and he is bound to meet with this kind of thing—in well-supported correspondence columns. That is to say: letters to the editor, containing either appreciation of the paper or intelligent interest in the cause which the paper exists to promote. It is so with ourselves. The production of this paper would be deprived of a great deal of its pleasure if our correspondence pages were not patronized by sympathetic readers, writing responsively to what we write, and evincing an anxiety for the progress of the business in which they are engaged. All through its existence we have never lost sight of the fact that the exhibitor is the arbiter of the business. Upon him, as we have recently pointed out, rests the responsibility of getting in closer touch with the public, than either the manufacturer or the renter. The duties of the exhibitor, therefore in his relationship to the public are obvious. He must give the public of his best in the way of pictures, and the manner of their presentation. We have insisted upon this point and that quite recently. From many aspects it falls to us to do so again this week, with reference to one of those aspects.

We make a point at every available opportunity of asking the exhibitor to let us know his needs in the way of pictures; to ascertain the preferences of his patrons, be they dramatic, comedy, scenic, industrial, native or foreign. We like the exhibitor to write us giving his experiences. We like him to say which pictures, which brands of pictures, succeed or fail with his audiences, and why. Our reason for this is plain. We want the exhibitor to influence the manufacturers through our pages. We know from experience that it is a very difficult thing to influence a manufacturer or his underlings direct. These latter are apt to ignore suggestions. If, however, these suggestions are made in a public print, it is almost impossible for a manufacturer to ignore them. If he does so, it is at his own risk of publicly ignoring what his customers want. Last week there were several letters in our columns from exhibitors responding to our suggestion that they should let the manufacturers know what their patrons wanted. One man stood up for the foreign made picture and very properly pointed out that many of these pictures were superior to the native article and were preferred to many American subjects. We do not wonder at the latter considering the puerility of some of the pictures that are at the present being released. Then another exhibitor took up our parable with regard to the paucity of comedies. He seconded our appeal for more of these pictures. Yet another, in his desire to escape from the "usual thing" seeks better and more scenics and industrials, and incidentally chides the Independents for their carelessness or indifference in this respect.

These are the kind of letters that gladden our hearts. We want every exhibitor (and, dear reader, this means you), week by week to make a daily study of the requirements of his audiences, to find out what they like and why. What they dislike and why, and to report to us results. A serious responsibility therefore rests upon the shoulder of each exhibitor to force the manufacturer to give the public what it wants, not what the manufacturer thinks. The average manufacturer, we fear, holds the public too slightly as readers of our columns must admit. Let him look down the pages devoted to comments on the films or to the section devoted to the stories of the films, and what does he see, in far too many cases? Antiquated stories imperfectly told and treated in a more or less amateurish way. There are reasons for this which we shall discuss in subsequent articles.

Meanwhile the object of this present article is to urge the exhibitor with all the emphasis at his command to exercise one kind of freedom of choice that remains to him whether he be licensed or not. And that is to let this paper know what he wants or rather what his public wants. If our advice be acted upon generally throughout the country, we shall have a speedy improvement in the average quality of the picture. This will be a case of the tail wagging the dog which, after all, is right and proper; for, though the exhibitor as we concede this week is and may be the arbiter in such matters, the final court of appeals as we remarked weeks ago is the public. The public is calling out for better pictures all the time. It remains for the exhibitor to do his part in gratifying the reasonable requirements of the public.

We understand that Epes Winthrop Sargent, publicity manager for the Lubin Manufacturing Company, will shortly retire from that position. What Mr. Sargent's future occupation will be he has not yet decided, but whatever it is he carries with him the best wishes of the Moving Picture World.

The Exhibitor and the Newspaper.

The wise exhibitor uses the newspaper, not only for advertisement purposes but for the further and greater benefit of its news and editorial columns. By so doing mutual advantage may result and greater public benefits accrue; this is more especially applicable to all places other than the large cities, because in the township newspapers there is less possibility of the "yellow taint" and a greater readiness to publish matters of a readable nature. From the fact that the moving picture occupies a position of such central and vital importance to-day—being the recognized medium of knowledge and pleasure; added to the fact of its universal acceptance by all ages and all classes of people the exhibitor is backed by a power that is in itself irresistible, therefore it only remains for him to adapt himself to the high moral standard and requirements of his community to assure a cordial support and further secure more than an adequate return in prestige and profit. To this end it is the purpose of this article to so assist the exhibitor that he may be able to secure the advantages we suggest. Every exhibitor who reads the MOVING PICTURE WORLD knows full well that not only is it his friend and helper but that its pages are filled with matter which he can use with great profit if he will follow the advice we are presuming to give. Before making our suggestions we prefer to present an example which will, we believe, give more effectiveness to our suggestions than anything else we could say.

In our issue of November 12, page 1124, there appears under the heading "The Press and the Picture" a letter from "W. Clark, Rockford, Ill., in which the writer tells of having used the columns of the local newspaper by having reprinted therein articles appearing in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. On the same page another letter signed "Wm. W. Hoyt" adds valuable testimony to the advantage gained by the use of the columns of the WORLD. In view of these examples we wish to enlarge upon the suggestion, that exhibitors everywhere may do the same, thereby initiating a CAMPAIGN OF EDUCATION throughout the entire country which can only react with untold advantage to the moving picture cause. There have already appeared on these pages many special articles and other matters of general importance, the reproduction of which in local papers is advisable. The MOVING PICTURE WORLD spares neither effort nor expense to give its readers the best; and although ostensibly a trade paper, we have often wished that a larger army of readers might be benefited by our efforts. Here then is the exhibitor's special opportunity which we present for what it is worth—and we believe its worth is great—feeling sure that not only the suggestions given but also the examples quoted will lead to a larger adoption of this plan. The power of the press is acknowledged, the "use of printer's ink" is an axiom of success, and as everybody reads the local papers the exhibitor is wise who uses its columns, and the reader is profited by his reading.

Every Little Bit Helps.

Moving picture shows may be like literature, there may be some "dime novels" among them, but like literature are doing a great work among the masses. The cheapness and accessibility and the freedom in time one has to stay in them reach a vast number of people.—Memphis Scimitar.

Brotherly Love.

The Savoy, a new moving picture establishment to be operated by the Beverley Amusement Company, was opened at Staunton, Va., Monday and had a most liberal patronage. It is worthy of note that the Savoy throws on the canvas a suggestion that reads, "After leaving here, visit the Lyric and Wonderland," showing a spirit that speaks well for its liberality and broad-mindedness.

Moving Pictures in Natural Colors.

THIRD ARTICLE.

BY THOMAS BEDDING, F.R.P.S.

In former articles on this subject, I vaguely hinted at some undeveloped possibilities in the way of producing moving pictures in natural colors. In this third article of the series, I will refer to them. Let me repeat: The object of these articles is to stimulate thought and experiment. There is no finality in this matter, as was pointed out last week in reference to the Urban-Smith process. There are many minds that have worked on the problem, and therefore the time is ripe for the publication of new, and perhaps unconventional ideas on the subject. As I have said before, I have some ideas, but I am not going to publish them yet awhile, or until it suits me.

Most photographers who make still negatives on glass are familiar with the not uncommon phenomenon of the appearance of color in the deposit. I, myself, and many others have produced negatives, developed with alkaline pyro which have shown most beautiful superficial color effects. Some people when they have had this exclaimed, "Eureka! I have found it." The "it" being photography in natural colors. Of course "it" was nothing of the kind. It was one of those curious chemic-physical phenomena which defy explanation. I was writing on this subject some years ago in London, when a gentleman took me up and contended that it was possible that color could be produced by direct exposure and development. In proof of which he sent me several lantern slides in the most natural colors, obtained, he said, by simple exposure and development. He could not explain the phenomena, nor could I, and there the matter ended. "Something in it," say people. But what that "something" is nobody knows.

Which leads me to the main point of this article, namely, that we are far from having exhausted experiments in the chemistry and physics of silver salts which, as everybody knows, are the basic material of the moving picture negative and positive. The haloid salts of silver, and even pigmentery or metallic silver, are very little understood. You coat celluloid with silver-bromide; you expose and develop it. You get a picture in black pigmentery silver. That is all of the property of these bodies which is known, although they have been experimented with for thirty or forty years. It is probable that one of these days some important discoveries may be made on the chemic-physical properties of metallic silver. Then there will be something doing in the way of natural colors.

Over twenty years ago, as I have already pointed out in these pages, the late Mr. Mathew Carey Lea published in the "American Journal of Science" the results of some extraordinarily interesting experiments on silver salts which I have never forgotten and which I think may interest those readers who are working on the subject of color in moving pictures. Of course, when Lea worked there was no such thing as a moving picture, and no such thing as celluloid. In brief, what Carey Lea did was to prove that deposited metallic silver could, by suitable treatment with organic substances, be made to yield, approximately, all the spectrum colors. He calls these bodies the photo-salts of silver. He got silver in a blue form, in a red form, pink, yellow and the like. In fact, he proved that instead of being simply a black deposit, pigmentery silver might be converted into almost any color. Probably this was caused by some alteration in the physical constitution of the molecules. Equally so, in another set of experiments, Carey Lea proved that silver could be made to assume all the physical and optical aspects of gold. He appeared to have solved the problem of the transmutation of one chemical into another, a dream of the old alchemists. However, these experiments of Lea created great interest at the time, but were not taken up by other men of science. If they had been, there is no knowing what we should have been able to do in the matter. Probably we should have gone a step further towards the elucidation of the problem of direct photography in natural colors—a thing yet to be accomplished.

Lest any of my readers should feel inclined to take up the thread of Carey Lea's work where he dropped it, I give the reference. His papers were published in the "American Journal of Science" for, I think, the year 1887. He called these salts photo-chloride or photo-salts of silver. If I remember aright, the yellow silver was termed allotropic silver. I do not know if the "American Journal of Science" is still in existence, but the volumes for the years named, can no doubt be consulted in any great library. I should not be surprised if these articles did not excite much attention in the minds of those who have given this subject of moving pictures in natural colors some consideration.

I think, if the intelligent reader will weigh what is printed in this and the two preceding articles on this subject, he will agree with me that for the first time in the history of moving pictures some experimental data have been published which point the way to probable accomplishments. The germs of many good ideas have been printed in these articles. It must be remembered that in photography many important practical developments have resulted from mere suggestions, just as slight and as casual as these suggestions may appear to the reader. It is doubtful, to cite a case in point, if moving pictures on celluloid coated with gelatine bromide of silver would be made to-day if not for the suggestions of a group of English experimentalists who, in the early eighties, told how the gelative emulsion could be made. One of these men was a friend of mine. He proved that the sensitiveness of the emulsion could be vastly heightened by boiling. That is the foundation of modern high speed photography—all due to a chance experiment and a suggestion published in a technical paper. Hence, though these discursive notes on the application of natural colors to moving pictures may not, at first blush, look exceedingly valuable, yet there is the possibility that I have given the germ of a practicable process of the future.

The Illustrated Song.

How long is it going to be before exhibitors awake to the fact that the illustrated song of the day vulgarizes the exhibition? What a combination of bad music, worse singing, and love songs of such a nature as to make one feel ashamed that so noble a sentiment or virtue should be prostituted to such degrading depths. It has recently developed in the courts that much of the evil reputation brought upon moving pictures was both from the singing and the singers of these songs. There are weak minded female sentimentalists in the moving picture places, even of the matinee idol worshipping variety, who are influenced by other singers; two of whom have recently found their way to the pentitentiary; what a pity that many of the songs do not find a similar oblivion. Only upon two occasions has the writer heard acceptable illustrated songs, one being when a young lady sang most acceptable and suitable songs, and the other when a young man sang standard American and patriotic songs in which the audience delighted to join. We hope for more acceptable songs with worthy and capable singers or none at all. At present the only redeeming feature is the tastefully colored slides.

The Posters.

An eminent critic once said "if the plays in the theaters are anything like the posters on the walls, I never want to visit and see them."

With what truth this can be said of the average moving picture poster of to-day; more crude and inartistic work it is impossible to imagine. How noticeable too that only the cheap and poorer places have them, their very presence suggests to those seeking the good and the best to pass them by; those flaming, glaring colors are danger signs rather than invitation, and are very seldom seen in front of the best houses. Why not be content with using large photographs? If the better houses find them sufficient surely the cheaper ones may, and if necessary to edify the public taste by all means do so. Glaring, high-colored, exaggerated posters and a screeching musical instrument may do for a side show with a traveling circus, but they are not good enough for a moving picture place with any pretentions towards refinement.

A Voice from the Berkshires.

By Virginia Bartlett.

Being a devout lover of the silent drama, I have often thought what beautiful backgrounds could be obtained for almost any outdoor pictures, in the Berkshire Hills.

Up here the moving picture is appreciated and attended by an educated class of people. At the Spa, in Pittsfield, Mass., the pictures are put on in an almost perfect manner; the picture is large and distinct, and the operator never hurries it. This is a decided relief, after being in houses where the pictures fly across the screen so fast that the story has to be guessed at.

The Spa shows only licensed films and the improvement in all the films is marvelous. Not more than eighteen months ago, the Biograph Company was in a class by itself and it needed only the announcement, "Biograph To-night," to fill the theaters, but now the announcement of a Vitagraph, Selig, or Essanay will accomplish the same results. I can remember when an Edison film was enough to almost empty the theater, while only a short time ago I saw "The Big Scoop," an Edison film that was one of the best pictures ever put out from a popular standpoint.

I attribute the success of a good many films to the popularity of the players, the Biograph artists formerly leading in public favor, but now their ranks are sadly depleted, and we have to go to the theaters showing Independent films, to see the old favorites.

I would like to impress upon manufacturers that the public is extremely partial to good looks in the players. This seems entirely forgotten by some of the producers. Only a short time ago I saw a Selig film, "Little Boy," in which the leading character used a most peculiar twist, or uplift of the chin; whether this was natural or assumed for the occasion, I was unable to decide; nor was I the only one puzzled by his strange behavior. At first I thought he was trying to suggest a case of extreme nervousness, which would later, in the film, develop into insanity. But the film closed and he was still trying to struggle out of his collar, for no apparent reason. This was a film which affected the entire audience unpleasantly, and was followed by an old Pathe, "The Nightmare," which dealt with an inkeeper's dream of murdering his guest. I could not commend the choice of films which put two such unpleasant films on the same program, but had I complained to the exhibitor, no doubt he would have put the entire blame on the exchange man.

However, we appreciate the many good pictures produced, and hope for still better ones, as there seems absolutely no limit to the producers' ingenuity.

A Blessing in Disguise.

As an afterclap of the amateur night agitation in St. Louis, we learn that an ordinance has been sustained requiring moving picture houses to tear out their stages. To many of the exhibitors this may seem a hardship, but when we think of how many of the acts are founded on pure nerve, and how few on talent, and also of the good money it costs for either, we have an idea that the exhibitors, in time, will come to regard the decision as a blessing in disguise.

The American Film Manufacturing Co.

Last week we had the pleasure of a long conversation with S. H. Hutchinson, late of the H. & H. Film Exchange. Mr. Hutchinson, we may explain, is the president of the new American Film Manufacturing Company in Chicago, already known to our readers by name. He was in New York on business connected with the proposed admission of his company to the Sales Company—a mission in which he was entirely successful. Indeed, in justice to the Sales Company and its operations, we are pleased to say that Mr. Hutchinson expressed himself entirely in sympathy with the objects and aims of this company, and the way they are carrying out their schemes for the advantages of the Independent side of film manufacturing and distributing.

All sorts of absurd rumors were afloat as to possible antagonism between the American Film Company and the Sales Company, but Mr. Hutchinson brushed these aside by saying that there was no foundation for them, and the relationship between his company and the officers of the Sales Company was most harmonious. Parenthetically we may say that Mr. Magie of the Solax Company, and David Horsely of the Nestor Company also recently and voluntarily assured us that the relationship of their companies with the Sales Company was quite satisfactory. Moreover, T. D. Cochrane of the Imp, who is also president of the Sales Company, quite recently made use of similar sentiments. So far, then, as evidence may be trusted, the Sales Company is carrying on its work to the satisfaction of those most intimately concerned, namely the Independent manufacturers and exchanges.

The establishment of the American Film Company out in Chicago is an event of the highest significance. Ever since the Independent film manufacturing movement took shape, Chicago was weak in this end of matters. Last year, two or three abortive attempts were made to institute manufacturies there. They failed, because the men at the head of affairs were neither scientifically, commercially or personally capable of handling the situation. At last, in the establishment of the American Film Company, we have a concern worthy of the Independent cause in Chicago.

Mr. Hutchinson has had long experience of the business at the exchange end of matters. He and his partner, Mr. Hite (H. & H.) recently surrendered their licenses to the Patents Company. It was a severance conducted on amicable lines. The relationship of H. & H. to the Patents Company was always agreeable, simply by reason of the fact that H. & H. carried out loyally and to the letter their agreement with the Patents Company. When they quitted they did so with clean hands and without any ill-feeling on either side. A very laudable state of things.

The new American Film Manufacturing Company starts thoroughly well equipped for its mission. It has command of very considerable capital and is in the business to stay. It has very fine studios in Chicago, and, moreover, it has surrounded itself with the best available producing, acting and technical talent which is under the control of A. M. Kennedy who is favorably known to our readers. Mr. Hutchinson is in supreme charge, so that everything augurs well for a successful career for the new company.

The company is fully alive to the making of pictures suitable for the average moving picture audience in this country. They intend to feature the comedy side of picture making, and in their dramatic subjects are solicitous to avoid anything which would provoke the displeasure of the censors. Their start has been so successful that during a recent trip Mr. Hutchinson was enabled to dispose of sixty copies of his first release. Emphatically a very auspicious commencement.

We have not the smallest doubt that the American Company will hold a strong position, not merely out West, but here, in the East, and we should not be surprised to see Mr. Hutchinson himself taking an active part in the direction of the Sales Company, which would certainly be strengthened by the inclusion on its board of some representative Western business men. An impression has been circulated that Chicago was a center of opposition to the Sales Company, and therefore to Independent progress. Mr. Hutchinson and his company will no doubt be able to do much to dispel this erroneous idea.

We hope in an early number to speak in detail of the pictures produced by the American Film Company. Meanwhile we are glad to give our readers these few data with regard to the concern which, in our opinion, materially strengthens the Independent moving picture situation.

THE INDUSTRY IN GENERAL.

The World's New England representative has, from time to time, spoken with people on the vitality and growth of the moving picture business, and has received some very peculiar—not to say absurd—ideas from them. As far back as three or four years ago, people have gone on record as stating that this enormous industry, with its great outlay of capital and brains, would utterly collapse within a stated time. Some said 1910, others stated 1911, still others 1912, and so on, would mark the end of the business. Well, here we are—it is the year of our Lord 1910, and the industry is by far in the best vigor and health yet attained, with every sign pointing toward a logical increase and general betterment on every side of the trade. The writer thinks the business yet in its merest infancy.

A year or two back, many moving picture houses were built by people with little capital, whose only idea was to make a few dollars in a fly-by-night way, and then close up and try something else. These people were the originators of the store show. Now we see this class of house dying out, due to lack of business, and in its place pretentious theaters are being built, dedicated to this greatest form of amusement. It would seem that a retrospection of these facts will show that the business is looking upwards, looking toward a bright and prosperous future. Look at the great improvement in the manufacturing of the films. Can anyone point out any branch of the theatrical business which has shown as much moral improvement as has this? The business of producing regular dramatic productions is a very old one; the business of producing motion picture plays is a very young one; but already the latter's plays are on a higher standard of general excellence than is their older brother. Go to almost any theater, then visit the moving picture theater and this fact will stand as a correction. Taking these things into consideration, the writer predicts a great growth and expansion in this industry, and feels that, year by year, will see all worthy members of the trade in an ever increasing state of prosperity. We even feel able to assure that able writer, Lux Graphicus, that he will surely live to see that "moving picture palace on Broadway;" and that the day is approaching when the rich will have a moving picture theater in their homes. Even a born pessimist can not help but be optimistic when looking the moving picture business squarely in the face. Let each one of us do his share to help it forward!

Deputy Consul Albert S. Troughton states that during the past four years the cinematograph has become very popular in Malaga, Spain, the four theaters being crowded nightly. Only 4½ cents is charged for first-class seats, and 1½ cents for second-class. French and Italian films are used exclusively. As the proprietors are continually looking for novelties, it would seem that Malaga offers a good field for American film makers. Nothing has yet been shown in the way of depicting American life or industries. One or two of the local theaters are connected with similar places through southern Spain, and American films once introduced would be widely viewed.

The Pictural Drama As A Fine Art

by Louis Reeves Harrison

There is a new rival in the field, or rather an old rival in new dress is reaching out strongly for public favor.

The Biograph pictures still maintain a high quality of dramatic performance, and the Vitagraph plays are working their way among the tendrils of human sympathy; the Reliance productions are magnificently staged and acted; the I. M. P. Company continue to give plays of striking originality; Gaumont scenes are often of the highest artistic quality; and now the Solax Company and other Independent producers are forging to the front with creditable efforts, but the general run of pictures are received by the audiences of picture houses with indifference when a good vaudeville performance is on. Time was when I could hardly sit through the cheap variety acts in order to see the motion pictures, but a great change has taken place.

There has been a slump in the theatrical business all over the country, largely due to the inordinate greed of those in control, and many fine actors have been compelled to appear in mixed performances, who would have scorned to appear on the stage of a motion-picture house a year ago. Early last week, there was a strong bill presented, one of the kind that can be appreciated a second time, at the Union Square Theater. All week the Fourteenth Street Theater was packed to the limit because of the best show ever given in New York for the money. The latter theater must have had to turn away patrons right up to this issue because of a highly entertaining series of vaudeville acts. One of these was good enough for the dollar houses and excited wild enthusiasm. The tremendous popularity of acts seen and heard, when they are above the low quality which formerly distinguished them, constitutes the most serious menace the motion-picture business has ever received.

This may not be fully appreciated so early in the game, but it will later on.

I am ranged on the side of motion-pictures. I believe they are capable of tremendous development, and everything I say is intended to promote their advancement. To accomplish this purpose, I do not range myself with those who jolly the producers along to get their good will, nor do I make frequent reference to those who are in the rear of the procession. From lack of money, or appreciation of what is required, many producers are still back in the woods trying to portray novels and stage plays on the screen. I deal principally with the live ones, houses destined to take front rank if they are not there already.

Manufacturers seem to have exhausted their stock of plays. There is a way to get new ones. Authors are not writing for amusement. Good plays are worth every bit as much to producers as good stories are to magazine publishers. Instead of fixing an indiscriminate rate, pay according to quality, so much down on acceptance and a fair addition if the play goes over in fine style. That is the easiest way to plant a new crop of playwrights. The principal fault with the Biograph productions lies not in the quality of performance but in a tragic tendency without compensation or relief. They were formerly strong on high comedy, but seem to be drifting away from those delightful little plays. The licensed productions vary greatly. The difference between their best and their poorest is too pronounced. The principal fault with the I. M. P. photoplays is a lack of snap at the end. It would be better to have them terminate at a high moment rather than carry them to a benumbing finish. Many of their productions are, otherwise, notable for fine acting and intelligent setting. The Reliance pictural dramas will never take high rank by acting and setting alone. Their plays lack the strong underlying quality of sympathy. Common human sympathy is so utterly lacking that their costly and elaborate productions arouse but little interest in the audience. The Gaumont Company is relying too much upon exquisite backgrounds. Many of their pieces are so vague in motive that they are confusing to the spectator. They are not clear enough. Of the "punk" turned out by some producers, the less said the better, their good plays are all too infrequent. The way to success leads, first, through the infinite variety and charm of different writers. There are a great many view-points in the mixed audiences at the theaters, more than a dozen authors can provide. The monotony, the sameness of many inferior products indicates that they are mere adaptations. Some of them are sub-titled to death, others die from inanition. One feels a sense of nothingness, a "what in the world am I here for" at the end. Among these we see the comedies where the actors slap each other on the back and do all the laughing, over a joke as stale as a drummer's story. Play up to the best in the audience, not down to the worst in it. That audience sees other pictures than yours, and is quite capable of making comparisons. That audience must be entertained.

High-class vaudeville acts, especially those embodying delightful music, have the tremendous advantage of being performed to appropriate music. It takes high quality in the motion-picture to overcome the well-known musical disadvantages of presentation. If I am any judge of audiences, they are getting very tired of poor motion-pictures. This will eventually react upon all producers. If the vaudeville performances continue along the lines of recent marked improvement, it will be a question whether the leaders can pull the tailers up or will be pulled back to a point of complete business reorganization.

Brownsville, Tex.—The new Dittman Theater, which recently opened, is generally filled to capacity. It has been well designed for the comfort of patrons and has ample ventilation and aisle space. There are 600 chairs and two proscenium boxes seating eight each. Mr. Dittman has always been a believer in the straight picture show, but his new stage is designed to accommodate vaudeville if his patrons demand it.

The "Nostrand," a Model Brooklyn Show House.

ENTRANCE TO NOSTRAND THEATER.

The Moving Picture World received a communication several weeks ago from a Brooklyn exhibitor, Mr. Henry L. Schloh, in which he invited us to visit and inspect his theater, the "Nostrand," at 657 Nostrand avenue. Attached to the invitation of Mr. Schloh's there is a tale.

In the number of the Moving Picture World dated October 17, there appeared on page 641 an article under the caption, "Inadequate Picture Work in Brooklyn." By turning to your copy of the World of the above date you will see that this rather peppery article is an arraignment of Brooklyn exhibitors for numerous faults, and among those mentioned are poor music, bad operating, poor taste in selecting pictures, bad ventilation, indecent vaudeville, etc. Without the slightest vestige of a doubt these conditions do actually exist in a great many parts of Brooklyn, but there are also moving picture houses in the "City of Churches" that approach as near the type of the ideal as we can hope to see, and it was with the object of bringing this fact to our attention that Mr. Schloh wrote.

In his communication Mr. Schloh announced that he was in the lists as a champion of higher grade amusement and in refutation of our article offered his own place as proof that there are in Brooklyn moving picture theaters of the character of which the World is the advocate. So to what better test could we put Mr. Schloh's qualifications than to have our representative visit his place and see for ourselves just how it is conducted. That is precisely what we did, and of the result we cannot speak in terms too expressive of our gratification and pleasure.

The "Nostrand" is indeed an exemplification of all that we have been trying to teach our readers a thoroughly high-class place of amusement should consist of. Perhaps this coinciding of ideas is accountable for by the fact that in the box-office as well as on the tables in the foyer (yes, they have a real foyer there and you will hear about it presently) are to be seen numerous copies of the Moving Picture World. These copies are read every day by the managers as well as the patrons and employees of the "Nostrand." In Mr. Schloh's own words, "It is my only text-book and guide, and by following its precepts I always proceed with the assurance that I am on the right track."

Although justly proud of his place, Mr. Schloh is very modest and left it to the writer to form his own opinion of the work that is being carried on there. Those of my readers who know anything about Brooklyn, know that to live in the St. Marks section means that your bank account is necessarily a large one. It is, in fact, one of the exclusive Winter residential sections of the town. The residents there have costly seaside or mountain homes where they spend the Summer months. The result of this is that the "Nostrand," which is located in the center of this section, closes its doors for the Summer, opening them again with the return of its patrons to town. As indicated by the name, the "Nostrand" is located in Nostrand avenue and is between St. Marks avenue and Prospect place. It is almost in the shadow of the Union League Club, one of Brooklyn's aristocratic clubs, and is also within a few blocks of the St. Marks Hotel, one of the finest hostelries.

Cozy Waiting Room of Nostrand Theater.

As you enter the "Nostrand," instead of passing directly into the auditorium you enter instead a handsome, spacious foyer about twenty-five feet square. Here are large easy chairs, settees and tables of green crex, and the decorations are carried out in a deep shade of green. The floor is white tile and a few white marble steps lead up at the rear of the auditorium. There are mirrors where in the polished surface the ladies can assure themselves that their hats are set on at the latest chic angle before leaving. This, so Mr. Schloh believes, banishes one of the greatest terrors that the ladies have in removing their hats. In the foyer also is a large rapid safety filter such as is usually seen only in playhouses.

On entering the auditorium you seem almost for the moment to have found yourself in some tropical country from which the last dim light of day is receding. The walls from about one-third of the distance up all the way to the ceiling are painted with an artistic mural frieze showing waving palms, sandy beaches, long stretches of blue ocean and sloping hillsides. The artist has accomplished his work perfectly and has left nothing to be criticised or desired. Were this not so, the effect would be ludicrous. You can readily realize how daring is this wide departure from the usual conventional color scheme of the walls. Your first impression as you enter is one of utter surprise and after this passes your feeling is one of pleasure as you proceed to enjoy an unexpected treat. There is nothing wearisome about it, either, and the second and third time you see it, you are just as well satisfied as the first. The auditorium is forty-seven feet wide and a trifle longer, and there is an incline from the back to the front of about eight feet perpendicular. There are three large skylight ventilators and four exits. The center aisle is six feet in width and there are two side aisles each four feet wide. The floor is heavily carpeted. For the convenience of the patrons a telephone booth has been installed, and by this means it is possible for doctors who wish to seek a few moments relaxation to visit the "Nostrand," for they are within instant touch with their offices and the hospitals.

The operating booth is nine feet in length by seven feet in width and is topped by a skylight ventilator so that the operator is always supplied with plenty of fresh air. Recently a new Power's No. 6 machine was installed.

One of the features of the "Nostrand" is the music, and not to mention this important adjunct would be to leave the half unsaid. Recently something was said in the Moving Picture World about reviving old-time songs. This scheme was tried out with success at the "Nostrand" some little time ago. Mr. Marvin Savage, who has charge of this department, has been in the game a long time, and judging from his gray hairs he might be said to be a veteran in it. He was formerly connected with the Vitagraph Company and was sent to Canada by them as a player some time ago. He operates with excellent taste about fifty three "traps" and is also a proficient bell ringer. He keeps his bells on the table at the front all the time and renders selections on them between reels. This is the nearest approach to vaudeville that will probably ever enter the "Nostrand."

The "Nostrand" is owned and operated by partners, Mr. William Haase and Mr. Henry L. Schloh. These two men can be easily classed among the leading exponents of moving picture exhibiting in Brooklyn. They are at present completing a new theater which will open in about two weeks. It will eclipse anything yet seen in Brooklyn. Of this you will hear more later.

The Picture on Its Trial.

During the recent conference of the Humane Societies in the National capital, the moing picture proposition was discussed from all points. Various opinions, widely differing, were advanced as to the good and evil tendencies of the motion picture, the educational and degrading influences of the films, censorship of reels, legal restriction of the number of houses, the necessity of such amusements, the prohibition of children unattended at these shows, and many other points relative to the motion picture business.

In order to discover the practical needs of the city of Washington, The Times has selected a committee of men and women in various pursuits to visit the local houses and give their opinions on this much-discussed problem. These are being printed daily in The Times and form interesting material for thought. Extracts from some of the most recent statements are printed below:

Rev. John Van Schaick, Jr., pastor of the Universalist Church of Our Fathers, has said in part: "I must acknowledge frankly that I went to these theaters with reluctance, that I dreaded the vulgarity of which I had heard so much, that I expected to be bored, but that, on the contrary, I was instructed, entertained and amused. . . . There were husbands and wives and mothers with their children, as well as children alone. There were representatives of all ages and many classes. They all conducted themselves like ladies and gentlemen. . . . As to the amusement itself, I am compelled to speak in high praise. This is not an unqualified endorsement: I intend to seek further. . . . There were some very silly things, of course, and some grotesque, unreal and exaggerated. There were some things I would not show if I were running the business. But there was a deal of real instruction, much that appealed to the imagination and emotion, and what is vastly more important, so far as these places go, amusement. That is what the masses need—rational amusement that amuses. It must be cheap. It must quicken and stimulate the man or woman who is dead tired of the monotony of his toil. If the 5-cent theater does all these things it is a benefactor to the race. . . . Prof. Patten, of the University of Pennsylvania, has said, 'Amusement is stronger than vice and can stifle the lust of it. It is the basis of economic efficiency upon which depends the progress of multitudes.' All the forces which cooperate to save man from becoming a machine are religious. Amusement is one of these. I wish that we had more playgrounds of various kinds for adults as well as children and that all knew how to play as well as work."

Mrs. Edna Keene Bushee, chief attendance officer of the public schools, has this to say about the moving picture theaters: "As a substitute for something worse, the 5-cent theater is no doubt a good thing. Standing alone, however, it possesses many features which tend to lower the standards and hurt the morals of our children. . . . The theaters have increased in numbers and their springing up represents in a large measure the waste earning of those who can least afford it. . . . I know children who evening after evening visit these places and are away from their homes until the late hours of the night without the supervision of any older person. . . . You may say that this is due to lack of parental control and home conditions, and that is true, but these places, large in number as they are, easy of access to the homes, within the reach of all financially serve as meeting places for boys and girls. . . . So far as my knowledge of these places is concerned, I have never seen an obscene picture in them. I have seen pictures, however, which I would consider highly demoralizing for children, and while not so hurtful, perhaps, in their effect upon older people, certainly have nothing to uplift in them and tend to lower standards of morality. We have heard much said against the yellow backed novels, but in my opinion, their influence is as nothing compared with that of the moving picture shows. . . . But I would not have the 5-cent theaters abolished, they may be made a great power for good. It has been said that they preserve the family unit and to some extent, I believe they do. Pleasure, in my opinion, is as necessary to life as work, and the cheapness of this pleasure brings it within the reach of all. . . . I would, however, ask for a reduction and restriction in the number, a strict censorship—and the elimination of vaudeville acts where young children perform. With these safeguards, I believe that the moving picture shows could be made to take their proper place as one of the greatest powers for good in the city of Washington."

Mgr. James F. Mackin, pastor of St. Paul's Catholic Church, gives his opinion of the moving picture houses as follows: "The moving picture, like all modern inventions, may be made a most useful instrument or a most terrible scourge. In the hands of intelligent educators it may be made to illustrate science, religion, history and travel as no other agency can. . . . In the hands of selfish mercenaries it will become a potent agency for destruction of the faith and morals of the young and here, in my opinion, the greatest danger lies. . . . Young children are allowed at will on the streets after nightfall, without escort or older companion, and as a natural consequence are attracted by the brilliant lights and the glitter surrounding these establishments. . . . I am strongly in favor of the recommendation made at the Humane Conference that children be prohibited from attending moving picture shows unless escorted by their parents or proper adults. . . . Next to the restriction of children, I am impressed that the most important feature to the moving picture houses that needs to be regulated is that of the films, . . . for there can be no estimating the consequences on a child's mind of a picture based upon criminal or immoral suggestion. When good, clean pictures are displayed and the children who see them are properly chaperoned, the moving picture theater has become largely an instrument for good. . . . Regarding the operation of moving picture houses on Sunday, I can not say that I am opposed to this feature, provided that they are not allowed to be kept open when church services are in progress. . . . During the hours when there are ordinarily no religious services being held, I can see no objection to their being patronized as a place of rest and recreation."

BOSTON.

Manager Broune, of the Old South and New Washington Theaters, Boston, has also recently gone on a trip to the "big town" to take a look at the "center of things."

October 12, 1910, was the first date that Columbus Day was officially recognized as a holiday in Massachusetts. The day was clear and cold and the moving picture men made a gala day's business. It is safe to state that the great majority of Boston's moving picture theaters were filled to their utmost capacity from early morning until late in the evening. Some houses even recorded the best day's business in their career up to that date.

Napa, Cal.—The Hayes Theater opened this season under new management. Since the opening the S. R. O. sign has had to be put up on several occasions. The Hayes will seat 1,000 people and will easily accommodate from 200 to 300 more. It is not a theater with a lavishly decorated lobby and nothing inside—but is the opposite. The lobby is fixed up very nice, but inside it is decorated by hand, beautifully, and is the work of an artist who has had wide experience. Your plea for good lighted theaters does not apply here for it is very light inside. Manager Goldsmith does not let expense stand in his way. You will see from the program enclosed the show they are putting on. Yes; they show vaudeville, but not the class you justly decry. Last week a star of the Bevani Grand Opera Company, which has been playing in 'Frisco, scored a great hit here with his selections from "Carmen," "Rigoletto," "Il Trovatore," etc. A superior class of film service is shown at the Hayes. I am sure if you ever saw the Hayes you would say it is one of California's best.

The Unique Theater (Independent) is drawing a good business. Thanhouser, Itala and Great Northern are deservedly the biggest attractions here.

The Novelty ran the "Passion Play" to record houses last week. A special lecturer was employed for this.

VAUDEVILLE—MUSIC—UNIFORMS.

Just returning from a trip to Indianapolis, Cincinnati, St. Louis, etc., I will have for next week more interesting news, showing how the country towns are doing a good business and how, by paying a strict attention to the management of their places, they have enlisted the support of the best classes. A photograph of the Gem Theater, of St. Louis, showing a string of automobiles waiting on the outside, is a proof that the rich folks are no more opposed to motion pictures.

While certain persons seem to ignore the Moving Picture World, we are proud to know that our magazine is sought by everyone interested in motion pictures. Why? Because the Moving Picture World is the only paper that tells the truth in regard to both sides, therefore it is of vital interest to the exhibitor.

We have fought against cheap vaudeville and it was a hard fight, as many other trade papers have claimed that vaudeville acts were a good thing to digest motion pictures. We know that our work has not been in vain as hundreds of theaters have followed our advice and have discarded cheap vaudeville to the benefit of their box receipts.

T. A. Bryan, of Cedar Rapids, Ia., was in Chicago recently and told us that he had decided to give up vaudeville and devote his house to good pictures only. This morning we were surprised and pleased to receive the following post card: "Broke the house record yesterday, $82.20; what will we do when we get our mirror screen——"

Mr. Bryan does not seem to regret having discarded cheap vaudeville. On the road, as soon as I present my card, I am greeted in the following manner: "We like the Moving Picture World; it is our guide; we find that we are doing better since we gave up vaudeville——"

Music.—The same thing can be said of our fight for appropriate music with the pictures. As we have already stated, we have received checks to pay our expenses to visit moving picture theaters of other towns, and at this writing I have two invitations in my desk accompanied with railroad tickets. If hundreds of managers have discarded cheap vaudeville, more have come to the conclusion that appropriate music and sound effects enhance the beauty of the picture. The old style of a self-playing piano or of a cheap pianist playing a rag-time tune, are things of the past, as every progressive exhibitor seeks now the services of the best pianists and of the best drummers and lavish money on instruments, sound effects and in many cases in orchestras of several pieces. It is a pleasure to receive daily letters from exhibitors telling us of what they are doing and visits from other exhibitors who want us to visit them and see for ourselves what they are doing to show the photoplay to the best advantage.

Last week, while passing through Cincinnati, Ohio, I paid a visit to the Bijou Theater and I must compliment the management for its excellent music and sound effects. The drummer of the Bijou is the nearest, to my memory, to approach the remarkable sound effects that made Lyman H. Howe so famous. Everything was as natural as could be, even the rattling of the chains of harness was rendered. When Miss Bennett, of the Edison film "The Song that Reached His Heart," is shown on the screen singing to the phonograph the song of "Annie Laurie" the audience was greatly and agreeably surprised to hear a good phonograph re-echo the supposed words of Miss Bennett.

Another of these progressive exhibitors is B. B. Risinger. the genial manager of the Majestics, of Memphis, Tenn. He calls his houses Majestic No. 1, Majestic No. 2, etc. Mr. Risinger visited Chicago to engage the best singers he could find and invest in some musical instruments, including the Deagan "bells." Mr. Risinger claims to have the most perfect music arrangement and cordially invited us to visit Memphis, as he feels confident that we can find in the management of the Majestics many points of interest to the readers of the Moving Picture World.

Mr. Risinger, like many outside exhibitors, was surprised to see how the Chicago managers are taking but little pride in their work and he claims that if he was as careless in his management, the investment of his stockholders would be a very poor one. We fully agree with Mr. Risinger, as we have often said that the worst place to see motion pictures were New York and Chicago and always claimed that the country exhibitors were doing more for the uplifting of motion pictures than the big cities. We can assure Mr. Risinger that we accept his invitation and that we will visit Memphis in the near future.

It is only a question of time when the moving picture theaters will be regular concert halls, where lovers of good music will elbow their way with the lovers of good pictures. The lovers of music will enjoy good pictures accompanying fine musical selections, and the lovers of good pictures will enjoy them still more when accompanied by good music.

Uniforms.—Another reform due to the Moving Picture World is the uniforming of the attendants and although some exhibitors are still hesitating at the expense of uniforming their ushers, we are gratified to see that many have followed our suggestions. We believe in the uniform, and to show that we do as we preach, we have our uniformed messenger boy, and we can say that since the young fellow presented himself in his new uniform to our Chicago patrons, they have shown him more courtesy. A uniform commands a certain amount of respect from everyone, even on the part of the uniformed one, as he would not do certain things that he would frequently do in his store clothes. A uniform must be neat and not a sort of carnival affair of loud colors and trimmings. as the wearer must feel at his ease and not imagine that he is a ridiculous target. If you want your attendants to look clean do not invest in cheap uniforms that will last no time, but give them good uniforms that hold their shape and the wearers will take care of them. Mr. Risinger, of Memphis, told us that all his attendants are uniformed and, to force them to keep clean and neat, he had the uniforms made to order from the best material and from the well known shops of James H. Hirsch & Co., of Chicago, where we also contracted for the uniform of our messenger boy.

We are so much in favor of the uniform that we have decided to open a contest, in which we will offer $100 in prizes to the six best uniformed groups of moving picture theater employees. The contest will open on December 1, 1910, and close on February 15, 1911. The prizes will be awarded on the neatest appearance, the number of attendants in the group not to be considered, as we wish to give an equal chance to the small and large houses. Full particulars and conditions will be published later.

As stated before, motion pictures are becoming very popular with the better classes and this change is assuming such proportion that all the small "dumps" or store front theaters of from 100 to 200 chairs are fast disappearing to make room for fine houses of larger seating capacity. With this reform well started, it is necessary for the exhibitor to give more style to his house by uniforming his attendants, by pleasing the cultured classes with the best music and the best pictures and by eliminating the cheap, objectionable vaudeville acts.

BALL OF THE M. P. & P. M. OPERATORS' LOCAL, NO. 165, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

The second annual ball of the M. P. & P. M. Operators' Local, No. 165, was given on October 31 at Central Turner Hall, Cincinnati, with an attendance of fully 1,000 persons, mostly Cincinnati exhibitors and operators. This ball proved to be a very successful affair, bringing closer together the exhibitors and the operators and clearing $500 for Local No. 165. A bevy of young ladies added to the charm of the evening and caused to be forgotten, for the time being, bad carbons, defective sprocket holes and many other troubles that are so often the cause of bad humor in the operating booth.

The Exhibitors and Renters' Association of Cincinnati was well represented, as was Cincinnati Lodge, No. 33, T. M. A. While the operators were delighted to have with them Mr. A. Dresner, the genial manager of the Magnetic Film Service; Mr. Thomas Riley, of the Southern Film Exchange, etc., the General Film Company was conspicuous by its absence.

Harry Schwartz, secretary and treasurer, announced that in the face of such a success, another ball will be arranged for next year.

The M. P. & P. M. Operators' Local, No. 165, although only two years old, is one of the best conducted locals, with a membership close to 100. The members stick together and are always ready to help each other.

The officers of Local No. 165 are: Edw. Kirsch, president; Jas. Curtis, vice-president; Harry Schwartz, secretary and treasurer; Edw. Walker, business agent; Fred. Biere, sergeant-at-arms.

One of the films of the week is undoubtedly "The Double," an Imp release of November 14. I made a note to see this picture as soon as it was visible. The opportunity came in the new projection room of the Sales Company, a day or two ago. I presume that in due course this projection room will be an ideal apartment for the purpose. At present it is slightly open to criticism. I refrain, however, from saying much about this point, as there are so many thin skins about Fourteenth street just now. It will meet the case, however, if I hint that in my experience the Pathe projection room on Twenty-fifth street is the best that I have yet seen. If the Sales Company can do as well as that, they will be doing very well indeed. It would pay each manufacturer, in my opinion, to have a very nice projection room for showing his pictures off to the best advantage. The Film Import and Trading Company of lamented memory had an ideal room for the purpose: one of the very few good things about that company—whose end was pieces, if not peace.

The scenario of "The Double" is by a lady whose portrait is given in the early part of the Imp film. She is a very nice looking young lady, indeed. She is also very clever, and very fortunate, for this scenario won a prize of $100 offered by the St. Louis "Times" for the best moving picture play. I don't know who the judges were in this contest, but they are quoted as saying that "its technique was nearly perfect": that "the action of the playlet developed from situation to situation in a remarkably interesting manner." Added to this the Imp Company feature the scenario and the film. One is therefore justified in assigning to this story, a position of special prominence amongst current releases. It has also to be judged by very high standards indeed. First of all it received the imprimatur of a jury selected by a great newspaper; then, it is given the special commercial and artistic endorsement of Mr. Laemmle and his merry, merry men.

Here is the story of "The Double," as I followed it on the screen. A charming girl is in love with a gallant soldier. He goes away to the wars. This soldier has a double, whom, in the absence of the soldier, the girl mistakes for him. So Mr. Double is invited to the lady's house and is made to do duty for the absent soldier. The double, realizing the position of affairs, assumes the position and authority of the real lover. Finally, however, the equivocal nature of his position induces him to apprise the girl of the deception he has allowed himself to practice upon her. But he confesses that he loves her. Meanwhile, the real lover is killed in ambush, and so the lady, accepting the situation, instantly forgets the slain hero, takes the new lover to her arms, and then the curtain falls on the one-hundred-dollar prize scenario of "The Double."

As a piece of photography the Imp people have never done anything better than this pretty picture. As a piece of natural acting, it was extremely delicate. As a piece of moving picture stage construction, it deserves very high praise. The story is palpable to everybody, even without the aid of sub-titles and explanatory legends. So that, on these grounds, Mrs. Clemens, the St. Louis "Times" and the Imp Company are to be congratulated upon "The Double." It will undoubtedly be a very great success.

I think it is a story which is something of an advance in scenario construction. It is an obvious story. It is so good that it practically "plays itself": the situations are so admirably and so naturally contrived. In fact, I don't remember in recent times any moving picture story which I have followed with such ease and so little a draft upon one's powers of understanding. It is all as plain as a pikestaff: logical, human—and ALMOST convincing.

* * *

Oh, that ALMOST! "The Double," in my opinion, would have been a perfect scenario if we could shut our eyes to its improbabilities. Since I saw this picture, I have put a question to several ladies of my acquaintance. I have said to the dear creatures something like this: "Dear Madam, Mrs. or Miss," as the case may be (for, as the reader knows, I am acquainted with several ladies), "suppose you were in love with me, and I went away to the wars, and my double, a man perfectly resembling me, presented himself to you, do you think, or do you not think, that you would know the difference between me, away at the wars, and my double, when I came to kiss you or embrace you?" Without exception, all these charming ladies replied: "You bet I would," or words to that effect. In other words, every woman to whom I have mentioned this plot, scouted its probability.

Improbability I think is the weak point of "The Double." And it is not a new theme. Years ago, Katherine Cecil Thurston, an English novelist, wrote a fascinating book, called "John Chilcotte's Double." John Chilcotte was an English member of Parliament and a society man. Another man had to take his place before the world, but not, if I remember aright, with the intimate connivance of the original's wife. The spurious John Chilcotte was John Chilcotte only in the popular eye. So the story had verisimilitude. But in the case of "The Double." No. 2 exercised all the lover-like rights and privileges of No. 1 without being discovered by the fair lady!!! Mrs. Clemens, the St. Louis "Times" and its judges, Mr. Laemmle and Mr. Cochrane must pardon me if I say that this is wildly, nay grotesquely improbable. Fathers have mistaken other boys for their own sons. Mothers have been alleged to do ditto. Cases of mistaken indentity are common. I myself have several doubles. But I do not think that the woman is born who could mistake one man for another—or, better, one lover for another! It is not merely improbable, it is impossible. Is it not so, ladies?

Nevertheless "The Double" is a most remarkably interesting film, and will be popular, increasing the reputation of all concerned in its production. "The Double" will also have another effect. It will draw us nearer the time when the moving picture play will be like any other stage play. It will not violate the probabilities. Most successful plays produced on the ordinary stage are those in which the action develops naturally, easily and with regard to the probabilities. These plays are true to life. "The Double," I venture to say, is not true to life. Still it is a very fine film. It might, in my opinion, have been made finer and more plausible if the girl in the play had been given some great and irresistible reasons for so readily transferring her affections from the dead man to the living man. No woman, it is said, ever forgets a man who has once loved her. She never forgets a true lover, and she does not readily transfer her affections from one man to another without tremendous causes. At least, this is what the ladies tell me. I have spoken to several of them, as I have already told you on this subject of "The Double," so this page of Lux Graphicus this week is therefore largely based on information supplied by the fair sex.

In conclusion, I would like to say, in the strictly personal sense, that I hope Mrs. Clemens will give us other stories. I hope that her work will have the effect of making the minimum market price of a scenario $100, and not a paltry five, ten, or twenty. I noted in the early part of these paragraphs that her name and picture were given on the film. I hope that in future this will be done with every film that is released, so as to give the authors a chance. The Imp Company certainly deserves congratulations for their enterprise in this respect, and I trust their example will be followed by other manufacturers.

Miss Lora Bona, the "girl with the golden voice, who lately appeared with such great success at Keith's Theater, Boston, Mass., has been engaged by Mr. Wm. J. Ganes, of the Manhattan Theater, Broadway, New York, to give her original selection and recitation of monologues, etc. Miss Bona makes her first appearance on Tuesday, November 15, at three o'clock.

The Moving Picture World congratulates Mr. Ganes on his evident intention to supplement the show of pictures with the highest class dramatic talent obtainable.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

To answer once and for all the many queries and theories in regard to the optics of projection apparatus, the Bausch & Lomb Company have kindly consented to prepare for the Trouble Department an exclusive and exhaustive article on the subject. The position of the Bausch & Lomb Company in the field of optics is second to none and an article or series of articles from one of their experts will be a great boon to readers of the Moving Picture World.

An Address.—Somewhere in California, according to my last information, are friends of mine, Joe Treville and wife, formerly known as the theatrical team "Treville and Landers." Treville is now or was running a moving picture theater, I believe, in Placerville. Can anyone give me news of them?—Editor Trouble Department.

More from St. Paul.—Geo. M. Pringle, St. Paul, Minn., comes in with the following: "My former communication was written to show that condensers are of great importance (not their foci, but their excellence). I have never yet learned anything by agreeing with the general idea, but rather by the exact reverse. With your permission, I shall supplement my letter with my understanding of the laws of refraction. First, light rays move in absolutely straight lines, unless refracted by some media. If they strike a refractor the angle of incidence and refraction are equal. Second, all bi-convex lenses have a principal focus which can be found in several ways, the best of which is, perhaps, to use a burning glass, the distance from the lens to the point where the light rays converge to the burning point being the principal focus of the lens. Third, all motion and most stereo objectives are a combination of two achromatic bi-convex lenses, and the following laws govern their action: (a) If an object, even a very large one, is at sufficient distance from the bi-convex lens, the rear and inverted image which is obtained is very small if it is near the principal focus. Illustration: In the action of the camera, the object is at great distance and the image is inverted on the ground glass. This law also gives the rule for finding the focus, either back or equivalent, of the lens, as already published in your columns. (b) If a very small object be placed near the principal focus of the bi-convex lens, the image which is formed is erect and at any distance beyond the length of the principal focus is larger. It is this second law that governs projection. The lighted object, either stereo or motion picture, is within the principal focus and as far as the objective is concerned is not inverted. Then what does invert it?

"Enclosed find drawing of my idea. If studied carefully you will note the beam of light is converging, and as all light rays move in straight lines, the converging rays will cross at some point and then continue to diverge unless again refracted. Now, take the lens in the drawing, which is 4-inch E. F. The back lens will give a burning point at, approximately, 7½ inches and the front lens at 5½ inches; and for the light rays to cross between the two lenses they would have to be separated by 13 inches instead of by 2⅛ inches. (St. Paul is now speaking of the two factors of the objective lens.—Ed.) At 11-16 inch, or half way, the circle of illumination from back lens is, approximately, seven-eighths the size of the front; and at 2⅛ inches, two-thirds the size of the front lens, the lens used being a Darlot.

"Try the following experiment: Thread the machine in the usual way, but for illumination do not use the arc or condensers, or any converging beam of light. Use instead an incandescent lamp, which gives diverging rays in front of machine. Watch the film and you will find it is not inverted by the lens. Second experiment: Take a No. 6 Power's; there is a small aperture in the frame over the balance wheel, where you can see the picture on the rear lens of the objective. It is extremely small and very bright. You had better use a smoked glass or freeze your carbons. You will find the picture has been inverted."

I was unable to follow a little of that dope, St. Paul, particularly as regards the circle between the lenses. I might add that I have tried out the experiment you speak of by looking at the image of the aperture on the back end of the lens, and will say that to my own surprise the image unquestionably was right-side up with care. I would say further, however, that if you place an incandescent lamp in front of the film in the machine and look through the objective lens you will discover that the picture appears inverted just as it is in the aperture, even though you back away from the lens a considerable distance. This particular letter will probably be too much for a good many of the column readers, but study it closely and continue making experiments, and between us we will solve this matter of the action of light rays through the lenses of a projection machine before we get through with it.

From Dixie Land.—Mobile, Ala., writes me as follows: "My thanks to you, Mr. Richardson, for valuable information received from the Operators' Column. I have been reading the World for quite awhile. It is safe to say that you have done lots of good in uplifting the profession. Contrary to the ideas of most operators, I have no choice as between the different makes of machines. I contend that results do not depend so much upon the machine as upon the man who runs it—the man with his hand on the crank and both eyes on the screen. My eyes never leave the curtain while the machine is in motion. I start with picture in frame with my framing rod half way of its travel and every bit of my attention is given to the picture from the time the machine starts until it stops. I would like you to tell us what, in your opinion, constitutes a good operator. Also, if you can spare the space, what questions operators have to answer in New York examinations. Does he write them out in the examiners' office, or take them with him? This letter, Mr. Richardson, is from Dixieland, where snow is a stranger and Old Sol a constant visitor. Also, with pardonable pride, I say this is not from a film 'snarler.'"

It would require too much space, Mobile, to set forth what in my opinion constitutes a good operator. Briefly, however, a good operator is a man who projects a perfect picture, not sometimes, but all the time. By "perfect," I mean perfect except for the inherent faults in the film and projection mechanism, for which, of course, the operator is not responsible. The examination in New York City is oral, one man being examined at a time. There are no written questions at all. Glad to hear from you at any time, Mobile; also pleased to know that you find the Department of benefit. I was in your city in 1904.

Outside Shutter.—Richford, Vt., writes as follows: "My machine is an Edison exhibition model, changed from a two-pin to a one-pin movement. The shutter is on the left side of the aperture. I would like to put the shutter in front of the projection lens. Will give you my plan: I wish to extend the spindle through the wooden case, making a slot to allow for the raising and lowering of the framing carriage. Bend and fasten a piece of steel to the frame extending through the wooden casing to make a journal on the outside. Now, if I should try this and wanted to put on a light, three-wing, one-piece shutter, would I have to change my bevel gears, if so, what size would you put in?

I could use a two-wing shutter. The shutter would have to be far enough out to allow the removal of projection lens.

"P. S.—My wife put up a kick because I put four or five condensers in the oven—but let her kick! I am going to try out that Winnipeg idea."

I am sorry, Neighbor Richford, but I am afraid your scheme wont work out, the trouble being that your shutter would be too small to get the right effect. Outside shutters are usually something like 7 to 8 inches in diameter, and there is a good reason for using that size, though the Lubin machine uses one considerably smaller. You could not increase the size of your shutter, owing to the fact that the spindle would set a given distance from the lens center, and this could not be changed without attaching the gear to some other portion of the machine. Aside from this, the thing would work all right, and the gears would be all right, too.

Power's No. 6.—Ohio (name of town suppressed) writes as follows: "We have ordered a Power's No. 6 machine and I would like some instructions regarding same: how to set a shutter and any other points you think would be of value. Do you think the Taylor's correspondence course would be of value to me? I am a bottle blower by trade, but wish to become a good operator. Have had some experience with correspondence courses while working at my trade and found them to be of little value. I like the Trouble Department of the Moving Picture World very much and have learned quite a bit. I read your comment on the letter by President Woods, of 'Frisco, and like it very much. I do not belong to an operators' union, as I am not yet capable enough, and there is none here anyhow, but I am a union man and belong to the Glass Blowers' Association."

As regards the Power's No. 6 machine, there are a few points that should be carefully looked after, some of which are as follows: Keep the sprocket idlers set away from the sprockets by about twice the thickness of the film. Never let the idlers run on the film, since that is likely to make it climb the sprockets. When you receive the machine the spindle carrying the shutter will be folded down against the mechanism. When you raise this spindle up, be sure and raise it as far as it will go, and not only tighten the screw engaging the hook in the casting, but also the screw immediately below (about 1 inch below) the spindle. It is very important that you get this spindle up as far as it will go. Fasten it securely in place. On the front of the machine is a loose collar into which the projection lamp screws. This collar is held in place by three large flat-headed screws. It is designed that you will screw the lens into the collar as far as it will go; then loosen these three screws and turn the lens so that the adjustment screw will be in the most convenient position, after which the three screws are retightened. Many operators make the mistake of pulling down on these screws very hard. This is neither necessary nor desirable. Tighten them just enough to hold the lens securely, and be sure that you tighten them in such manner that the ring is square with the front plate, thus bringing the lens into proper alignment. Full instructions for setting the shutter of this machine will be found in my reply to Chattanooga, Tenn., this week's issue.

As to the Taylor's correspondence course, I really do not know very much about it myself, although I lecture one hour each day at that school. I have not, however, carefully examined the correspondence course, but will say this, that it would be a very, very poor proposition, indeed, if it were not worth the $5 Mr. Taylor charges. As a matter of fact, I think there is no doubt at all but what it is worth at least that sum of money to any man who wishes to improve himself in projection matters. I am glad that you are determined to become a good operator. I like to hear that kind of talk. We have got altogether too many of the other kind.

Very Secret.—And now cometh a good friend with request that we answer certain questions, and not only is his name and the name of the town suppressed, but the name of the State as well. The question is as follows: "Could I project a picture successfully from behind the screen? How far away must the machine be placed to get an 8 by 10 picture? Would the light be too strong for the people's eyes? I have a room 11 feet high and would have plenty of room behind the screen."

Yes, you can project a picture through a very thin screen. Get thin bleached muslin. Your film must be placed in the machine with the smooth side toward the light. That is to say with the emulsion side towards the screen, else all reading matter will be backwards. Your machine must be set somewhat lower than the curtain so that the audience will not be looking right square into the lens, in which case they would see a bright spot in the curtain. No, the light would not be as strong that way as though the machine were on the other side. The size picture you will get at any given distance will be dependent upon the focal length of the lens. With a given focal length of lens the further back you get from the screen the larger will be the picture. When you buy your machine, tell the person from whom you purchase it the size picture you want and the distance your machine will be from the curtain. He will, or should, supply you with the proper lens.

Polarity Changing.—Los Angeles, Cal., writes as follows: "Friend Richardson—I take the liberty of calling you 'friend' because I have gained so much valuable information through your Department. I am sure all those who are interested in the advancement of operating and in good projection feel that you are their friend. I am enclosing a sketch which might be of value to some who have trouble with the polarity of their lamp changing. It is not quite as handy as a double throw switch, but is much cheaper. If you think it worth a little space, all right; if not, the waste basket is handy and no harm done. If the World desires any news pertaining to moving picture theaters in Southern California I am in a pretty good position to secure it."

Many thanks for your kind words, Los Angeles; and let me assure you that nothing of this kind reaches the waste basket. I at one time had considerable trouble with polarity changing myself. I was operating in a large house in Chicago, supplied by a plant in the building. They had considerable trouble with the dynamos and switched from one to the other. Every time they switched the polarity of my lamp changed.

A = Operating switch
B = 50 ampere single cartridge cutout block.
C = Cartridge fuse (with fuse blown) To which wires are attached by drilling holes in contact and soldering.

In the sketch the wires from the lamp are attached to the contacts of the cartridge fuse (c) by soldering. This fuse (c), however, is one that has been blown, merely the contacts being used. Fuse (c) fits into receptacle (b), one contact of which is attached to the negative and the other the positive wire, so that by merely reversing the ends of the fuse (c) the polarity is changed. The sketch is excellent and self-explanatory. I am glad to have ideas of that kind at any time; also we shall be glad of the news items you speak of.

Trouble with Focus.—Indiana (name of town suppressed) has a bundle of trouble, as follows: "Enclosed please find check for another year's subscription to the World, which I would not do without at any price. I am using a Power's No. 5 machine with an Allen adjustable lens; throw a 12-foot picture at 60 feet, using 220-volt, 60-cycle A. C. through a G. E. mercury arc rectifier connected so as to deliver the maximum amount of current; ⅝ cored carbon top and ½ inch carbon below, both Electra, pink label. My picture is out of focus on the right side for about 18 inches. I have tried new aperture plate and tension springs but it did no good. I have tried another lens, but the effect was the same. Can you help me out in this very annoying matter?"

Most certainly your information is complete, Indiana, and I wish all inquirers would do as well. Your carbons are all right, as is everything else pertaining to the light. The trouble doesn't lie there. I would call your attention to my reply to Havre de Grace, Md., in November 5 issue, though I hardly think this will fit your case, since you say you have tried another lens. See to it that the head of your machine sets square with the table-board. If your machine sets to one side of the screen; that is to say, if it does not set square in front of the screen, that very likely is where the trouble lies, in which case your only remedy will be to square the machine with the curtain. I would also call your attention to my reply to Alfred S. Corey, Somerville, N. Y., page 990, October 29 issue. If none of these things appear to fit your particular case, kindly communicate with me further and we will see what can be done.

Kind Words.—New Bedford, Mass., sends in a sketch of the triple pole switch connection, winding up his letter with the following: "This is the first time I have written to you, but I am a regular reader of the column and cannot find words to express my appreciation of what you are doing. Keep up the good work, Mr. Richardson, as you have done more to improve projection than anyone else.

The cut that New Bedford sends in is excellent and will be reproduced in another place. His kind words are highly appreciated and we trust the Department will merit his approval in the future as it has in the past.

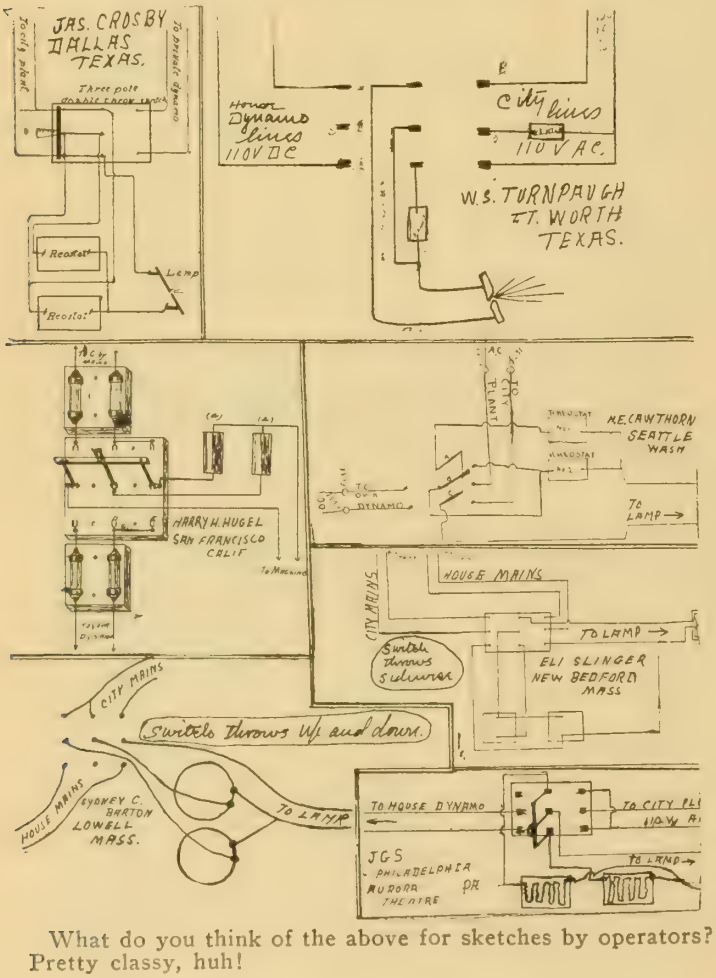
That Triple Pole Connection.—On page 1051, November 5 issue, appears a letter from San Francisco, Cal., calling the editor down on that Weatherford, Ohio, wiring job. San Francisco suggested that instead of publishing his diagram at once I set the boys thinking by asking them to submit diagrams of the connections spoken of, which I did. In reply a great number of sketches have been received. Practically all of them are correct, though some not made in the best possible way. Here are a few of the best sketches with the names of the persons submitting them, that at the center being from the gentleman who wrote the letter from San Francisco. The sketches are ingenious and highly creditable to those submitting them.



What do you think of the above for sketches by operators? Pretty classy, huh!

Sprocket Holes Showing, Etc.—Toronto, Ont., Can., submits the following: "Dear Friend Richardson—I read the World from cover to cover every week and think it is the best moving picture publication printed, especially The Column. I notice some of the men are having trouble with sprocket holes showing on the screen. I had this same trouble with my Power's No. 5, and found that by putting a new spring on guide roller at the top of gate it eliminated the trouble. I like to see you get after the careless operator. There certainly are some of them right here in the city of Toronto who need stirring up. With regard to picture being out of focus on one side, I had an experience of that kind and discovered that the head of the machine was not setting square with the table-board, which threw one side slightly out of focus."

Many thanks, Toronto, for your kind suggestions. We think the World is a pretty good paper ourselves; at least its editors are bending every energy toward the production of that kind of a publication. We leave it to our readers to say what measure of success has attended our efforts.

Information Desired.—T. J. Reed, Inspector, Department of Electrical Inspection, Muncie, Ind., makes the following request: "We are going to license moving picture machine operators in the city of Muncie. If you can give us any information as regards examinations for operators we shall be very thankful for the same."

The following reply was sent to this letter: "As regards examinations, there should be no set routine of questions. A written examination is neither necessary nor desirable. Examinations should be oral.

Your department will merely desire to ascertain whether or not the various applicants possess sufficient knowledge of projection apparatus, and what pertains thereto, to be safely placed in charge of a theater operating room. To qualify as "safe," they must have a good working knowledge of the force they will handle, viz., electric current. For example: they should not only know that a certain minimum size of wire must be used for the operating circuit, but they should also know why it is required. They should be able to explain intelligently the action of the rheostat and transformer. They should be able to test for shorts and grounds. They should be able to explain why more projection light is obtained from a given number of amperes D. C. than from the same number of amperes A. C.

These and other similar practical questions will enable the examiner to quickly gauge the applicant's real knowledge of the electric current and its application to projection. A few queries will then determine his ability, or lack of it, as regards projection apparatus itself. I would suggest a few as follows (to which very many more may and should be added): Have the applicant set the revolving shutter of a machine, having first explained what office the shutter performs. What size is the aperture? What size is the picture on the film itself? What is the size of standard aperture? What focal length moving picture lens is required to project a 15-foot picture at 60 feet (or any other size and distance)? What size stereo lens? Have applicant point out (a) aperture plate (called also "picture gauge"), (b) intermittent sprocket, (c) tension springs, (d) star, (e) cam-wheel (also called pin-wheel), (f) framing carriage. How much film passes through a standard moving picture machine to each turn of the crank? How do you measure the focal length of a condensing lens? Describe the operation of putting in a new star and adjusting same to run.

These, Mr. Reed, are merely suggestions. The questions may and should be varied with each man examined, but they should be confined strictly to practical things, tending to determine the applicant's real, practical knowledge. Never, never, never resort to "catch" questions. That particular practice is neither fair nor just. The examiner who is unable to determine an applicant's competency without resorting to catch, or "fool" questions (such as, for instance, "What is the voltage of a short circuit?") is sadly lacking in knowledge himself. Always remember that the applicant's right to earn his daily bread at his chosen profession is at stake and with that right you have absolutely no right to monkey. The man, naturally, having so much at stake, is more or less nervous and not in the best possible condition to tell what he really does know. To further confuse him with foolish questions is nothing short of a cowardly outrage. Give the man a fair show by asking fair questions, but if he then fails to qualify turn him down, no matter who he may be. If, however, there seems some doubt, dismiss him with instructions to reappear for examination in 30, 60 or 90 days, as seems best.

Under no circumstances disqualify a man because he answers one or even two questions wrong, unless it happens that the queries and his answers be such as to thoroughly demonstrate his total lack of knowledge. As an instance of such a possible question and answer, I have heard an applicant reply to the query, "What is the rheostat for?" by asserting that it was to "Regulate the heat!" The same man said he would not hitch up to a No. 10 wire, but would require a No. 6. Good! But he then said he would not hitch up to a No 1 wire because it would be "too strong." These two questions, or either one of them, disqualified him, of course. I will add that that man had been running a moving picture machine for six years.

There should be one practical operator on the examining board. Be very careful that no examiner allows, consciously or unconsciously, personal prejudice to influence him in any way.

Your board is at liberty to, at any time, free of all cost, ask any questions desired through the Trouble Department of the Moving Picture World. The name will, if requested, be suppressed in replying.

Coal Gas for Projection?—Bloomfield, Ia., writes as follows: "I am a constant reader of the World and especially of the Trouble Department. Would like to know if I con use gas for projecting moving pictures; that is to say, ordinary coal gas from the municipal gas plant? What is the best gas outfit that you know of? I am thinking of running three nights out of each week in a town where there is a gas plant. I am having trouble with my Power's No. 5 take-up. The film jumps off the take-up sprocket about every 50 feet; doesn't take up film too fast or too slow. It jumps off mostly when I start. Also my picture is out of focus on one side. Gate, fire shield and aperture plate are all true."

No, Bloomfield, you cannot use ordinary illuminating gas alone for projection purposes. The only real and practical propection gaslight is the calcium or oxy-hydrogen light (ordinary gas used in conjunction with oxygen). There are several good gas outfits on the market, two of which we can recommend, the "Perfect," made and sold by the Capital Merchandise Company, 225 Dearborn street, Chicago, Ill., and the "Model B" gas outfit, manufactured and sold by the Enterprise Optical Company, Chicago, Ill.

I would also refer you to an article on gas in another part of this week's paper, unless it gets crowded out, in which case it will be in next week.

As to your take-up trouble, there are several things which might cause it. Too tight a take-up tension, the remedy for which, of course, would be to loosen up. Badly worn take-up sprocket; remedy, get a new one. Lower magazine setting over to one side so as to give a side pull on the sprocket; remedy, line up your magazine. Stripper plate not properly set, thus throwing the lower loop out of line with the take-up sprocket; remedy, set one end of the stripper out further until the loop comes up squarely onto the take-up sprocket. Take-up sprocket out of line with intermittent sprocket, that is to say, too far to one side or the other; remedy, line it up. In one of these things you will undoubtedly discover your trouble. By the way, one other thing: your sprocket idler should be set away from the sprocket by means of the set screw provided for that purpose by about twice the thickness of the film, and kept that way. If the roller runs on the film it will have a tendency to make the film climb the sprocket.

Single Condenser.—Montreal, Can., writes a very complimentary letter and winds up by asking why it is necessary to have two condensing lenses instead of just one single lens.

Many thanks for your kind words, Montreal. As regards the condensing lens: in order to concentrate the light with the single lens your lamp would have to be a long ways from the lens, which would involve great loss of light. By moving the lamp back far enough you would get a spot with a single lens, the same as you would get with a double one, I believe, but the arc would be so far from the condenser that four-fifths of the light would be lost.

Another One on Light Rays.—C. E. Boone, owner and manager, the Brownie Theater, Platte, S. D., contributes the following: "Without any preliminaries, I wish to say that the Trouble Department of the Moving Picture World is the best ever. I have been on the point of writing you for some time and this 'light rays' proposition has finally started me off. I have been operating for eight years and have had my own place of business for the past four years, so that although I am now an owner I still retain a warm spot in my heart for the crank turner; this for the very simple reason that I have always done my own operating.

"The different opinions expressed on this light ray proposition have caused me considerable amusement. I really wonder if any of the men have gone into the matter in the right way. It is a thing that anyone can prove to his own satisfaction, since he can see the results with his own eyes.

"Take any machine with which the rear end of the moving picture objective lens can be seen while the film is in motion. That is to say, any machine in which a person can look deep into the rear end of the lens. (The Edison is the machine I have been using.) There is a small hole right beside the thumb latch on the gate, and by looking through this hole you can see deep into the lens. Now, while the picture is being projected look at the rear glass of the lens and you will see an exact reproduction of the picture that is being run right side up. In fact, you will see two pictures, both of them right side up. Then look deep into the lens from the rear end and you will see a reproduction of the picture upside down. The picture reverses itself between the aperture plate and the rear end of the lens; it then re-reverses itself in the center of the lens, goes out at the front upside down and reverses itself again between the front of the lens and the curtain. All I ask is that any doubter look with his own eyes and he will see that this is true—unless the picture could reverse itself within the thickness of the glasses of the lens. The light rays passing through the stereo objective lens are altogether different in their action from those passing through the moving picture lens, but I will not go into that matter until I see if this 'lecture' of mine is worth while. I send herewith a sketch that is self-explanatory."

LENS TO SCREEN
At this point (aperture) the picture is upside down.
Here we see two pictures, both right side up.
Here the picture is again upside down.
and at the curtain it is again right side up!

Next! On second thought, however, there won't be any "next" until we receive the Bausch & Lomb article.

Tools.—Sacramento, Cal., asks whether the operator or the house should furnish the tools, and what tools would constitute a complete kit for operating room work.

The writer believes in the operator owning his own kit of tools, except such things as bench vise and permanent fixtures of that kind. It is neither practical nor desirable to have the house furnish the tools for the operator. My own tool kit consisted of the following, when I was operating, and with it I could do any job I ever had occasion to tackle: One pair of "button" pliers, 8 or 10-inch; one pair 8 or 10-inch lineman's side-cutting pliers; one pair of 8 or 10-inch gas pliers; one large and one medium screw driver; one screw driver with good length of carefully tempered blade for small machine screws; one 10 or 12-inch cabinet rasp for sharpening carbons; one small riveting hammer; one carpenter's claw hammer; one small cold chisel; one medium sized punch; one very small punch for star and cam pins; one pair of small tinner's snips; one pair blunt-nose film shears (such as clerks use); one small gasoline torch for soldering wire joints. With this kit you will be able to do almost any job, but you will have use for every one of them one time or another. In addition to the above the house should furnish an assortment of files, as follows: One 8 or 10-inch flat file; one 5/8 round file; one 8-inch "rattail" file; one small bench vise with anvil attachment; some soldering wire, soldering flux, film cement, binder strips, mats, slide cover glass and wires of the various sizes and kinds likely to be needed. All tools should be arranged on the wall wherever is most convenient, though the pliers and screw drivers should always be in reach of the machine operator. Never under any circumstances leave tools lying around; always put them back in place the instant you are done with them. When a breakdown comes and the audience is sitting in darkness, that is no time to be hunting for tools or anything else. Often and often I have seen an operator spend three times the amount of time necessary to repair a breakdown in hunting up tools and materials with which to make the repair. That kind of work spells "sloppy"; it spells incompetency in great big letters. Have your screwdrivers magnetized so you can pick up screws with them.

Setting the Power's No. 6 Shutter.—Chattanooga, Tenn., asks for instructions for setting the Power's No. 6 shutter. Setting this shutter is a very simple operation, once it is understood. This shutter may be more accurately set on the end than the beginning of the intermittent movement. In the accompanying sketch will be seen three screws labeled "A," "B" and "C," the same being shown at one corner of the diagram in a small drawing representing the hub of the shutter. Both these sketches are drawn to exact proportion.

Screw "A" is the one on the inner hub of the shutter. This screw fits in the V-slot of the spindle holding the shutter in place on its shaft, and it should be set up solid in the groove and not disturbed except when it is desired to move the shutter in or out on its spindle or remove it entirely. To set the shutter, proceed as follows: Loosen screws "B" and "C" so that the outer hub and shutter revolve freely on the inner hub. Now turn the flywheel of the machine in the direction it normally runs until the intermittent sprocket moves and completes its movement. Next turn the flywheel backwards until the intermittent sprocket just barely begins to move, the point being to get the Geneva movement set exactly at the point where the intermittent sprocket has barely ceased to move when the machine is running in its usual direction. Having accomplished this, stick your thumb in between the spokes of the large gear just back of the flywheel and press the ball of your thumb against the flywheel to hold it perfectly stationary while you revolve the shutter until it sets just as you see in the sketch, the dotted line representing a horizontal line. You will observe that the two lower openings set exactly the same distance below an imaginary horizontal line. In other words, these two openings set level with each other and the lens is just a little bit less than half uncovered when the intermittent sprocket has barely come to rest. Now tighten either screw "B" or screw "C" just enough to hold the shutter in place, but not tight enough but what you can slip it on the inner hub by using some little pressure. Now, put a film in the machine and project the picture on the screen in the usual way. Pull the framing lever clear up and then clear down. If there are any flashes of white upward from white objects in the film, shove the top of the shutter just a little bit over away from you; that is to say, slip it on its inner hub slightly, holding the flywheel stationary. If, on the other hand, there are flashes of white downward, hold the flywheel stationary and pull the top of the shutter slightly towards you. Do this until all white streaks vanish, after which set up screws "B" and "C" tight and the job is done. Users of Power's No. 6 machine will do well to preserve this for future reference.

Some Local Information.—New York City, N. Y., asks: "(1) Is it permissible that we run a Standard machine with a motor here in New York City? (2) Can powdered graphite be purchased here in the city? Montgomery & Co., whose address you gave, only handle flake graphite. Will it answer the same purpose? (3) Could I remove the rear cell of a projection lens and still project a picture? (4) Where could I learn something about the Standard machine and the working of its motor?"

(1) As I understand it, it is. Call up Cortlandt 8520 and ask for Mr. Wynkoop. He will answer the question authoritatively and officially. (2) The "flake" graphite will not do. The Montgomery Company assure me they do handle the powdered graphite in one-pound cans. (3) Yes, but the picture would be of poor definition and very small. Removal of one factor makes the remaining one of very long focal length. (4) Go to the office of the American Moving Machine Company, 101 Beekman street (corner Pearl street), Manhattan, and they will supply you with any needed information.

THE EXHIBITORS' CALL TO ARMS.

In this land of the free and home of the brave, oppression seems to have a stronger hold than in the most despotic countries.

How long will moving picture exhibitors continue to be at the mercy of selfish and autocratic manipulators, who do not seem to care for the future of cinematography, so long as they can work a Wall street game to get rich quick? These men in high places are not lovers of the art: they are financiers and are killing the goose that lays the golden eggs.

Moving pictures have proven to be good educators. They supply the amusement of the people, and should be carefully nursed by the manufacturers, to make them still more popular, and to even force them into the schools and the churches. This should be the aim of the manufacturers. But, with their success, they have grown selfish. They have no consideration for their neighbors. Their only ambition is the mighty dollar.

I am speaking of the ways of both the licensed and the Independent manufacturers, as their two pet institutions are based on the same selfish principle. I do not say that one is better nor worse than the other, but I can safely say that both institutions are working for the benefit of a few privileged manufacturers, who, with their arbitrary rules, restrict other manufacturers, a thing that should not exist in a free country.

These corporations, by monopolizing the business, are forcing the exhibitors to take just what they are given. The exhibitor has a right to select his program.

It is time for them to take the matter in their own hands and overthrow this yoke of oppression. We must see a change; the exchanges should control the manufacturers and not the manufacturers the exchanges. We must have an open market: the exchanges should not be forced to stock themselves with what the manufacturers unload on them. Then the films will be sold on their merits, and the manufacturers will have to keep improving their pictures if they want to retain their sales.

To-day the Sales Company says to the exchange: "You must buy such and such films" and if the exchange calls for another make, the Sales Company says: "We do not handle it, but we have something better or just as good." The case is the same with the General Film Company. Any licensed manfuacturer can put on the market a film like the "Reserved Shot," and although the exhibitors may say: "We cannot show such a film to ladies," the General Film Company must take it just the same and force it on the exhibitor. With such methods, the manufacturers can produce anything they want, and by eliminating competition they will be able to reduce the cost of negatives.

In all other lines of business, the manufacturer is not the dictator; he is merely the servant of the distributer. Why should we reverse a general rule for motion pictures? I am positive that if one of our film manufacturers was to go to a shoe store and be forced to buy a pair of shoes that did not please him, on the ground that the storekeeper was forced to take what the shoe manufacturer forced on him, our film manufacturer would raise a big kick and call it an outrage that in a free country he was dictated to by the shoe manufacturer.

If a hat manufacturer wishes to make high hats of tin, he is free to do so, but he cannot force them on the storekeeper.

The renter who is paying his good money for films surely has a right to pick what he wants.

Competition is the life of business. Suppress competition and you will go down in no time. Every season we see something new in furniture, in clothing, etc., because the manufacturers of the whole world, with the exception of the film makers, are not the dictators but merely the obedient servants of the distributers and of the public, and as they cannot force any old thing on the distributers, they improve their goods to get the orders. Factories and warehouses are loaded with goods that the distributers refused to take. This is not the case with the film business. If the renters and exhibitors had the rights granted to other merchants, to buy only what they want and what they can use, the "Reserved Shot" and other such films would rest on the shelves of the manufacturers instead of resting on the shelves of the exchanges.

The manufacturers claim that the daily newspapers and the ministers are unfair. No! We have too many pictures that should not be shown, and suggestive pictures that are thrown on the market because the manufacturers do not want to be the losers. The Federal Government should confiscate certain films of the Kalem Company, as they play the part of the yellow journals by exciting American passions against the Japs.

The exchanges have failed in all their organizations. The only remedy now is for the exhibitors to organize themselves to fight the autocratic rules of the manufacturers and regain their independence by dictating and not being dictated to. When the manufacturers find their shelves loaded with films that they cannot sell, they will improve their work, and try to produce pictures suitable for the market. The moment that we have a genuine and fair competition in the ranks of the manufacturers, we will see a bright future for the photoplay.

While the motion pictures started as the cheap amusement of the people, they have quickly risen to such fame that the better classes are taking to them, the boards of education, the churches, etc., are offering their support to make cinematography the great and universal educator. Such good prospects are checked at this time by manufacturers who are simply out for the money and allow their managers to produce anything they wish irrespective of morals and of decency. The wishes of the people are for good pictures, that, while amusing, can be elevating and instructive.

While a few manufacturers will deride this letter, I feel confident that the great majority of the manufacturers, the ones that stand for quality, who love their profession and who want to make of motion pictures not only the best and most profitable investment, but an industry to last for generations, will be on my side. These conscientious manufacturers will be only too willing to be dictated to by the distributers, as they will recognize that such a policy is the only good one to infuse new blood. The good manufacturers have nothing to fear, the demand for high class pictures is great enough to assure them a quick sale of every foot of film that they can turn out, provided that the subjects are clean, well staged and well acted. The spirit of competition is absolutely necessary to maintain this quality.

We are at the opening of what has always been considered the best season, yet the reports, although favorable, are far from up to expectations. Why? Because there is a feeling of unrest. Many exhibitors claim that the service offered by the General Film Company is not exactly what it should be and they fear that it will be worse in the future. While corporations have some good features, an employee will never give the attention of a boss. Let me illustrate: Jones starts a film exchange and by paying close attention to his work, makes a success. The General Film Company buys Jones and retains him as a manager at so much per week. What is this to a man that could make more money by himself? It is natural that Jones, when reduced to a mere clerkship, will work like a machine with no ambition.

This explains why some exhibitors complain of the service and complain that they no longer have the privilege to shift to another exchange. On the other hand it is true that some licensed exhibitors are highly pleased with the present service.

The Independent exhibitors also complain of a poor service. This is due to the fact that the Independents have not enough good sound exchanges to buy in sufficient quantities to give a good service. Independent films are not scarce, but exchanges with money are not there to handle the business.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES.

The Royal Theater, of New Bedford, Mass., devoted to exhibiting moving pictures and vaudeville, was recently purchased by Baylees & Hathaway. Andrew Ashley will be in charge of this house on its opening under the new proprietors.

Southbridge, Mass., will soon have a new moving picture theater, built by Blanchard Bros.

Lawrence E. Thayer, owner of the Orpheum Theater, Newburyport, Mass., was arrested Saturday, October 29, charged with maliciously setting fire to his theater. The Orpheum was burned October 16, and the fact was duly noted in the World. Mr. Thayer is said to be well known in the New England States, where he operates a chain of moving picture theaters. The case is not at all a sure one, even Fire Marshal Rice stated that although it was evident the fire was caused by an incendiary, there was not enough evidence, in his opinion, to warrant this prosecution. Mr. Thayer was arrested in Haverhill, Mass. His friends call it a great mistake and it is hoped that this charge will be easily refuted.

Bellows Falls, Vt., will soon have a new and large theater devoted exclusively to photoplay, as the Dreamland Theater is now nearing completion.

Jesse Crook is now transforming Odd Fellows' Hall, Lowell, Mass., into a modern moving picture theater, to be called the Colonial.

The Grand Theater, of Lawrence, Mass., has been bought by G. B. Jones from O. Neville. The former intends to expend considerable money in alterations before he opens his new theater for business.

Mr. Clinton, of Bridgeport, Conn., is building a large moving picture theater in that city. The house will hold nearly 1,800 people, and will cost $40,000. All reports state it will outstrip all the other moving picture theaters of that city.

Marblehead, Mass., about five miles from Boston, had its first taste of local photoplay when the Lyceum Theater was opened, October 10.

Canton, Mass., another Boston suburb, is now among the number of small towns having its own local moving picture theater. John Lannigan opened a neat, cosy little house there the latter part of October.

Jake Lowrie, general manager of the Beacon Theater, Boston, has sent his assistant, Chas. Heath, to New York City to look over any new ideas that might be able to be viewed in that city.

THE POWERS PICTURE PLAY EASEL.

We wrote last week of the interest which the general public takes in the personalities of moving picture actors and actresses. All the moving picture making companies are realizing this and many of them are intelligently administering to a legitimate curiosity. The result of it is, that the entrances of moving picture theaters are becoming liberally adorned with photographs of the performers in the films shown inside.

Taking advantage of these facts, the Powers Picture Play Company are putting out a very attractive easel which carries real photographs of the principal players in the Powers Picture Plays. This easel and the photographs sell for $5.00 and form a very attractive ornament to the entrance or foyer of a moving picture theater. The easel is 6½ feet high, carrying a frame 32 by 38 inches, containing sepia toned photographs of the Powers players. This elegant ornament is of mission oak finish. It is pretty and tasteful to look at. We think that every Independent exhibitor throughout the country should obtain one of these Powers Picture Play easels.

"Waiter No. 5" (Biograph).—A dramatic picture dealing with the downtrodden poor in Russia, then suddenly transferred to America as the principal actors are forced to fly from their native country because of revolutionary tendencies. The scenes among the poor are harrowing enough to arouse the most generous impulses and cause one to believe the unpleasant criticisms of the Czar. This portion of the film will attract attention. Then comes the appearance of the former chief of police as a waiter in a city restaurant in America, where, unknown to everyone but his wife, he works continuously until his son is old enough to marry. Some trouble develops then, but it is quickly swept away by the timely arrival of the Czar's pardon for whatever misconduct might have occurred in earlier years. The change from one country to another and the excellent acting in each of the parts do much to make this film attractive, yet it must be admitted that it is not up to the standard which has been set and generally followed by the Biograph people.

"Mike, the Housemaid" (Lubin).—Oh, yes it is. This is no misstated subject and Mike makes good the excellent qualities described in his letters of introduction. He takes good care of the silver and that was exactly what the advertisement called for. To be sure he invited his pal in to help about this care, and this was done while the family were out. They didn't quite figure on Clancy's appearance, but the officer came just the same, and that led to difficulty. The confederate got nearly drowned in the bathroom and the family returned before the officer left. That put Clancy in right and he was warmly complimented for bringing in two flagrant offenders. The comedy is contagious, and while the unfortunate Mike doesn't quite see the joke it is obvious that the audience does.

"Birthday Cigars" (Melies).—A rattling comedy which is based upon the disarrangement of labels upon two boxes of cigars. The family with the rich uncle visiting them gets the explosive cigars, and when one goes off in the old gentleman's mouth he refuses to see the joke. Then when the whole box is thrown into the fireplace the explosion shakes the house and he departs in high dudgeon. Of course the family which had expectations cannot entirely enjoy the joke, but the audience will, and that is what the exhibitor is looking for.

"Generous Customers" (Melies).—A somewhat original subject in that it shows how a party of automobilists played upon the credulity of a restauranteur and induced him and his waiter to engage in a species of blindman's buff which apparently proved costly. Still, there were compensations, because the party which stole away without paying the bill returned a check for the amount with a liberal tip for the waiter.

"The Early Settlers" (Selig).—A picture full of thrills and one that will commend itself to those who have studied such matters as an accurate reproduction of what occurred many times during the settlement of this country. Indians objected to the encroachment of the white man and they annihilated more than one family quite as effectually as they purposed annihilating this one. Not all had friends who could and did assist them, and because of that this picture ends more pleasantly than many of the actual occurrences did. This picture has reproduced the prairie schooner with fidelity to our ideas of that primitive mode of travel. The camp scenes and the skulking tactics of the Indians are all faithfully reproduced and mark a masterly understanding of the actual conditions. The picture is a valuable addition to the collection of historical films which graphically reproduce scenes and incidents long since passed into oblivion.

"The Little Station Agent" (Edison).—A stirring railroad story with a love story to insure interest. Jealousy over a girl leads to the dastardly deed of cutting loose a number of freight cars which go rushing down a mountain with an apparently dead man on one, in imminent danger of wrecking a fast train with hundreds of people on board. The girl station agent saves them all from destruction and saves her lover, who was knocked insensible on the car by his rival. The wild ride down the mountain is realistic, and then, when the girl gets the message and she and the superintendent start out to sidetrack the flying freight and save the express from destruction there is thrill enough to satisfy almost anyone. Then comes the emotional part, when the miscreant who perpetrated the deed is arrested. The girl's hand is slipped in that of her lover as the rival is led away to prison. It would be difficult to conceive a more stirring film, or one that would appeal with such irresistible force to any audience.

"Silver Cloud's Sacrifice" (Kalem).—An Indian drama, showing the love story of a white man and an Indian girl. The girl's father objects and in assisting her sister to meet her lover, Silver Cloud meets her death.

"The Woman of Samaria" (Pathe).—A colored reproduction of the Bible story of Jesus and the woman at the well. These scenes which are so graphically portrayed in the Bible are reproduced here with all the fidelity to costuming and color possible to procure by careful study of what is supposed to be the exact place where this occurred. It is the old story retold in pictures and it will appeal to all who have heard the story since their childhood and have, perhaps, imagined what the scene was like. Here they can see it as vividly and as correctly as the imagination can conceive it.

"The Children's Revolt" (Vitagraph).—A successful picture of two pampered children who prefer to break away and play like other kids. Finally they succeed and the picture represents the good time they had before they were captured by horrified parents and nurses and carried away to the house. It is a protest against the growing custom of some families of restricting the play of the children. It tells plainer than words can do it the story of childish desire for freedom and the opportunity to have a good time in a childish way.

"A Western Way" (Essanay).—A story of Western life which represents in a graphic way the peculiar code of honor that was observed among thieves and outlaws. To have a prisoner go to bed and know that he would be there the next morning is unusual to Eastern ways of doing, but that has actually occurred more than once out in the open. The gambling sheriff is a character who had many counterparts in the days that are gone. To see the thief come down and rob the keeper of the gambling house for the benefit of the sheriff is also unusual, but all the more interesting for that reason. In short, the film offers several novel situations. No one is sorry when the sheriff turns the prisoner loose after exacting from him a promise to do better in the future.

"The Fishing Smack" (Gaumont).—One rubs one's eyes when this picture flashes on the screen, for one seems to have stepped out of the present rushing, hurrying world into one of those quiet, picturesque old fishing villages which apparently belong to another century. All the picturesque features are present. In fact, it is easy to see that the producer has made a picture which in every way tells the story of this life which is foreign to a large proportion of humanity. The story centers around an old man who loves his boat as he does his life, a common thing in fishing towns, and refuses to part with her, even when illness forces it. But the boat is sold without his knowledge and his heartbroken appearance when he discovers it is pathetic. But the young man who bought it proposes that he enter the family by marrying the daughter, and all parties being agreeable, the situation is cleared of its unpleasantness. Even though the love story is an added feature, the beauty of the picture is in the reproduction of the picturesque scenery and the life about the village.

"Abraham Lincoln's Clemency" (Pathe).—A story of Lincoln told with a good deal of sympathy by the American company. It is historically correct and involves a young soldier who was sentenced to be shot for sleeping on post, but who was pardoned by Lincoln and afterward was shot as he led the scattered Union soldiers to victory by rallying them around the colors. Perhaps the most interesting features of this film consist of the visions: first the one that appears to the President as he sees the soldiers, then the gray haired mother and the nameless grave. At the end where the stars and stripes and stars and bars are rolled together and unrolled as the national flag, there is a touch of patriotic sentiment which is difficult to appreciate without seeing it. BANK FLOOR, ASHLAND BLOCK : : CHICAGO, ILLS.

all, the whole story of the Civil War is told in that little bit. While it is by no means certain that the producer intended to make that the climax of the picture, it is, and everyone who sees it is constrained to cheer.

"In the Mountains of Kentucky" (Vitagraph).—A moonshining story, with some jealousy and excellent acting included. There are two scenes which will attract with especial force, where the man is led away to prison and the woman who has been taking his attention away from his wife is so indifferent to his fate. Then comes a perfect frenzy of dramatic spirit when the wronged wife drives the intruder out of doors and hurls her belongings after her. It is seldom that actors in motion pictures reach such a height of abandon. But it is admirably done and the woman naturally falls exhausted after it. Later when the man comes, with the avowed purpose of killing his wife, as evidenced by his club, he discovers their babe asleep. This is the climax of the picture, and what follows is merely explanatory. The effect of this film upon the audience is very marked, and a ripple of applause follows its close.

"The Fugitive" (Biograph).—A psychological picture based upon the strength of mother love. The salient feature is that the mother of a Confederate soldier just killed, hides the slayer of her son, even after she knows the facts, allowing him to escape, for the sake of that other mother in the North. All other scenes are accessory to this. The only dramatic interest is in the mother's struggle when she is considering whether she shall give up the fugutive or not. Mechanically the film is satisfactory.

"The Taming of Wild Bill" (Lubin).—A Western comedy presenting over again the oft-repeated fact that love, or what sometimes passes for it, changes the characteristics of the wildest and fiercest individual. The film is full of surprises and melodramatic situations.

"Max in a Dilemma" (Pathe).—A story which has been told before, and not so very long ago. The burglar, after a long chase, gives back the $500, thinking it hardly worth risking his neck for.

"Micro-Cinematography—Recurrent Fever" (Pathe).—A scientific film, representing the progress of a case of recurrent fever, which sometimes causes serious epidemics in Russia and elsewhere. The action of the growth of the germs in the blood of an inoculated monkey is clearly shown.

"The Lady Barbers" (Selig).—A comedy presenting the disturbances caused by a lady barber opening up in a country village. After submitting for a few days, the wives of the men who patronize the place so freely, open a shop for the young men of the village, and the invaders are soon on their way. A comedy it is true, but somewhat open to question in its suggestiveness and horseplay.

"The Bachelor" (Selig).—A short comedy; that word "short" designating its especial merit.

"Trip Through the Canadian Rockies and the Selkirk Mountains in Canada" (Edison).—An excellent production which represents artistically the glories of the Rockies in the scenic beauty spot of that portion of the American continent. It is a trip along the Canadian Pacific road and gives a good idea of what scenic wonders present themselves to the eye of the traveler in that section.

"A Lassie's Birthday" (Edison).—A love story which is really comedy, since it shows plainly enough that the young woman had her mind made up before her birthday and the attempts of all excepting the right one to secure her favor were wasted. The picture presents no novelty and the story is of no special strength.

"Hank and Lank as Life Savers" (Essanay).—These comedians enact a lively comedy, using the beach at Coney Island as a stage for their operations. Lank succeeds in securing a purse for his bravery, but Hank misses and because of his failure Lank narrowly escapes drowning.

"The Masquerade Cop" (Essanay).—Detailing the adventures of an unfortunate on his way to a masquerade attired as a policeman. Taken for a real officer he is called upon to make arrests, but fails and finally lands in the police station charged with impersonating an officer. His uniform is stripped from him and he takes the homeward track attired in the twilight and a barrel.

"Pharoah, or Israel in Egypt" (Gaumont).—A reasonably accurate presentation of the popular conception of the tenth plague which was the one that made Pharoah permit the departure of the Israelites. The acting is satisfactory. The staging is probably as accurate as can be made and the coloring undoubtedly gives a fairly true reproduction of the costumes of the period. As a pictorial presentation it unquestionably reproduces with sufficient accuracy to be pleasing the beginning of the exodus.

"The Tale of a Hat" (Vitagraph).—A comedy with considerable life, but based upon wrong premises. It is conceivable that a man might mistake another woman for his wife, but it is an absurd stretch of imagination to show him belaboring another man without looking to see who the woman might be. Perhaps such scenes are permissible in a fake comedy of this character, but the producers should not expect the public to always patiently submit to such absurdities, even in a comedy. If comedies of this class are made true to facts they will be quite as funny and far more satisfactory.

INDEPENDENT.

"Cohen's Generosity" (Defender).—It is true that one good turn deserves another, though sometimes those helped or benefited forget it later or when they have an opportunity to reciprocate. Not so Cohen. He never forgets the boy who befriended him once when he was sore beset and at last when the opportunity comes he returns the favor with the accumulated interest of the years. While this film tells a simple story there is something about it which arouses the emotions and makes one feel that after all the world is not so bad. It tells a story which everybody can understand.

"Willie" (Imp).—A characteristic Imp film. The city people are quite ready to welcome the unsophisticated country boy to their home, but he turns out to be somewhat different from what they expected. He seems to be able to give points to the entire family and when he ends up with eloping with the heiress whom the city cousin expected to marry there is consternation indeed. But it is one of those things for which there is no help and however one may regret the result it is impossible to change it. The acting is admirable and in the case of the hero there is a free and easy, devil-may-care attitude in his work which is quite refreshing and cannot help but please with its rendering.

"The Fault of the Grandmother" (Itala).—A drama from this house which is well acted and clearly photographed. Perhaps some will not altogether like the play, but they cannot question its forcefulness at any rate. Nor can they gainsay the quality of the work done.

"Fatty Buys a Bath" (Lux).—If everybody had as much difficulty after he purchased his bath as this individual did it is safe to say that not many baths would be bought. The difficulties he encounters and the ill luck which seems to follow him after he became inextricably wedged in his new bath supply a lively comedy and bring more than one hearty laugh. When he ends in the river it seems as though that must be the finish, but a diver rescues him and he goes on his way rejoicing, leaving the hoodoo bath behind.

"Her Diary" (Lux).—A love story told by entries in a diary. The girl waits long and the entries express her feelings, but ultimately her waiting his rewarded and she becomes the wife of the man she loved through all the long years. It is a pathetic story, simple in its outlines, yet withal telling the tale of a heart that remained true.

"A Wooden Sword" (Cines).—It is dangerous to pawn a sword, particularly when you are a soldier in the service of your king. But in the instance here the offender gets off without a court martial because he wears a medal of bravery upon his breast. This is all there is to the story which wastes a good many feet of really good film in the telling.

"Red Wing and the White Girl" (Bison).—Not essentially different from many other Indian pictures which have come from the different studios recently. The acting and scenery are good, but there is the handicap that Western pictures which tell nothing in particular are no longer desirable.

"The American Queen" (Thanhouser).—A novel method of rescuing an imprisoned queen. The American marries her, and then, inasmuch as she is entitled to the protection of an American she receives it, troops being landed from the ships lying in the harbor to effect her release from prison. The wedding is unique, the girl being inside the prison and reaching out through the gate to take her lover's hand. That and the novel method of release are interesting and stamp the film as above the ordinary. The rascally cousin is killed in the encounter which releases the queen.

"The Heroine of 101 Ranch" (Columbia).—A Western story that is different, offering reproductions of scenes which convince because they do not go beyond what might be possible under certain circumstances. The players have caught the spirit of the piece and their work is beyond question as good as any that has been turned out recently in the way of Western films. The heroine proves to be all that the most exacting might desire, performing her part with a dramatic earnestness which is difficult to describe. The film should be popular in the motion picture world as the ranch is famous in the Western world, a combination which it would be hard to equal and still harder to surpass.

"The Jewel Case" (Great Northern).—A drama of merit which affords opportunity for some clever work by the capable actors of this house. The release will assuredly be popular because it tells a good story and tells it in a convincing way. The staging and costuming are apparently correct and the work of the actors is satisfactory.

"A Fatal Picnic" (Great Northern).—A lively comedy which will insure one hearty laugh at least in your program. The action is lively and carries one irresistibly along, developing numerous amusing situations as it progresses. The audience does not fail to show its appreciation by hearty laugther.

"The Sufferer from Insomnia" (Itala).—The depiction of the trials of this unfortunate are sufficient to make one wonder where all these difficulties were discovered. Moreover, the various schemes for relief are hints which may or may not be worth following. At any rate the audience learns what happened to one afflicted person.

"Where Have I Left My Fountain Pen?" (Itala).—Of course he looked everywhere but where he left it and when he was done looking he was quite as wise as he was at the beginning. Fountain pens, according to this story, are extremely elusive articles, and the picture seems to prove its case. The audience will get much sport out of the picture before it closes.

"A Russian Romance" (Powers).—A play based upon a novel situation. A woman's husband is murdered. She seeks the murderer and has him arrested. He afterwards proves to her that he is innocent and she, by a clever ruse, secures his release from prison. With good costuming and good acting this combination of circumstances affords ample opportunity for satisfactory dramatic work.

"The Resurrection of Lazarus" (Eclair).—In general terms this is a dangerous subject for a motion picture house to take. Thost who believe in it regard it as almost too sacred to be openly discussed, while those who do not believe in it look upon it as nonsense and will be disposed to ridicule it. What happens in each instance would be largely due to the producer, but more so to the mind which is brought to the picture. In this instance the producer followed reasonably close the story as it is given in the Bible and the characters perform their parts with so much dignity that a skeptic cannot fail to be favorably impressed. The actor who assumes the part of Jesus does it with a dignity that is impressive. The film has been reviewed by two others in previous issues and the present writer can do no better than to confirm what they have said. The effect upon the audience was plain. A profound hush pervaded the theater, ample testimony of the fidelity with which the actors performed their parts. It was a bold experiment, but it succeeded admirably and makes another step forward in the history of this enterprising house.

"The Religious Fetes of Tibet" (Eclair).—Another release which will undoubtedly impress any audience as it did the one of which the writer formed a part. It was an interesting and altogether satisfactory exhibition of a little known region. The religious ceremonies so graphically depicted run back so far into the past that their origin is lost in the mazes of prehistoric legends. The film is educational in the highest sense, conveying information and exciting interest at the same time. The technical work is exceptional for such a subject and in every way it may be accepted as a picture far beyond the average. A long description appeared in a recent issue, and it need not be repeated. It is, perhaps, sufficient to say that the audience followed it with the closest attention and clearly wished it were longer when it closed.

"Keeping His Word" (Imp).—Some of the Imp films have a satirical vein running through the story they tell, but this one appeals strongly to the emotions. In that respect it is dramatic, perhaps because it is so simple. Not an eye was dry when the little fellow fell back dead after the wealthy gentleman found him. It is but fitting that the little brother should have a new home, but the rejoicing is tempered with regrets that the faithful one could not have lived to enjoy it, too. Dramatic in its simplicity, it so clearly presents actual conditions which surround the common people that it appeals with startling power, and excites the emotions as no mere drama, however perfectly acted, could possibly do.

"Spirit of the West" (Yankee).—Not all Western pictures are convincing, but it is easily understood that what this one depicts could have happened. The treacherous half-breed and his successful scheme of abduction, the escape of the girl, the attack on the emigrant camp, the personal battle on the verge of the precipice with the thrilling plunge over are all so clearly probable, that the picture possesses an interest which not all Western pictures have. An audience will watch with breathless attention such a picture, following closely every motion of the different individuals concerned in it and applaud the victor at the close. So far as could be seen, the details were carefully represented, indicating that the producer had gone over his material thoughtfully and had done everything in his power to make the picture accurate without destroying its life. That success crowned this effort is apparent. The audience responded to this with sufficient force to prevent any misunderstanding.

"Moonshine and Love" (Powers).—The title is rather a misnomer. It refers to an illicit still and not to the rays of the silvery moon as might be suspected from the title. However, the picture will not disappoint. Laid among the Tennessee mountains, it deals with the adventures of a school teacher who goes into a cave and accidentally stumbles upon an illicit still. He is held a prisoner by the moonshiners, but to increase the complications it develops that the daughter of the leader among the moonshiners is in love with the teacher, and sends a note urging his release. Of course the appeal is heeded and the young man leaves. All evidence of the still is destroyed by a cave-in, which is a fitting climax to an excellent story. Some of the scenic effects deserve special commendation. The entire picture pleases the audience and in one instance, at least, there was applause when the young man was released.

"When Love Is Young" (Powers).—A farce comedy which presents some interesting complications in love making. The mixup keeps the audience laughing and guessing what the next turn will be until the end, and that is funniest of all. It will interest girls who happen to have handsome and widowed mothers. It presents certain interesting possibilities in the direction of comical mixups, which are worthy serious consideration by those who enjoy a hearty laugh.

"The Branded Man" (Bison).—A drama which presents more probable features than some from the same house. To be marked or branded would be a serious thing for most men, and this film not unworthily tells the story of one such unfortunate wight.

FROM THE LONE STAR STATE.

The latest addition to Ft. Worth (Tex.) playhouses is the Princess, a $50,000 vaudeville house, which is now playing Sullivan-Considine circuit. The house is very attractive, seating about 1,000 people, and has all curtains and scenic effects controlled by drops. Joseph Aronoff, proprietor, has been in the moving picture show business for several years in Dallas and later in Ft. Worth.

In 1908 Mr. Aronoff opened the Lyceum, a 5-cent picture show, and being successful he has now opened one of the finest vaudeville houses in the State. Gus Arnold is business manager for the Princess and has been prominent in show circles for some years past.

The latest in picture shows will be R. A. Healy's $10,000 show on Houston street. Mr. Healy, with T. J. Walsh, has recently purchased the Scenic Theater from W. H. Perkins and will immediately erect the most handsome theater in the South for the projection of moving pictures. He will name it "Healy's Vision of Arc." It will have a large arch front about 30 feet high, also will have eight private boxes in the balcony and lower floor. The front will be dotted with hundreds of Tungsten lamps. Just upstairs, or up in the rear of the arch, Mr. Healy will put in one of Wurlitzer's $4,000 orchestrians.

R. A. Healey will also put in the most up-to-date operating room in the city, equipment to consist of two moving picture machines and two exhaust fans and a motor rewind. All doors and drops to be automatically controlled in case of fire. Healy's "Vision of Arc" will seat about 450 people, with a good slope to the floor. The means of ventilation will be two 4-foot exhaust fans placed in the rear of the house and blowing the cool fresh air right through the house toward the front.

The moving picture operators here in Ft. Worth are organizing now and have good, bright prospects of coming through all O. K. They have chosen their officers and sent off for their charter and have a nice balance in the treasury, after having an excellent picture show float in the Census Celebration and Carnival parade. They are asking $24 per week for eight hours' work and are going to be backed up by a bonding company, so that in case of fire by operators' carelessness the exhibitor will not be the loser. Each operator will be required to stand a very rigid examination, which will be conducted by two or three of the best operators in the city.

The Chicago-Philadelphia baseball series of pictures were shown here to-day (October 29) at the Healy Theater and proved a great attraction. The pictures are unusually clear and well photographed.

Chicago Notes.

The Bell Theater, Madison street and Western avenue, is a thoroughly up-to-date theater, which is in many ways a model and an excellent example of the way in which a modern moving picture theater can be developed. It is owned by W. H. & J. A. Bell, father and son, who, to develop the theater according to their ideals, spent about $10,000 on its construction. The result is to be seen in one of the very best moving picture theaters to be found anywhere. The front is inviting, with ticket office of plate glass, dado of gray marble and mosaic floor, and does not in any way suggest the "nickelodeon." The interior of the house fulfills the promise of the outside. In seating capacity the house is of average size, seating about 300. The floor has a heavy incline all the way to the screen, insuring a good view of the pictures from all seats. The lighting system in use is adequate, while the curtain itself is very well shaded from the side lights. Ventilation, a matter which is only too often neglected, has received proper attention here, and several large exhaust fans keep the theater well supplied with fresh air without any undue drafts.

The management of this house is also commendable. The active management of the theater is in charge of J. A. Bell, and under his expert direction the entire evening's entertainment runs very smoothly, with never a hitch nor halt. The screen is dark between reels only long enough for the people to get out of the theater and the waiting crowd to get in and seated. No one is allowed to enter while others are passing out, and the show is not started until all the incoming patrons are seated. Messrs. Bell believe in giving the public their full money's worth, and the show is never hurried, though nearly all the time after 8 o'clock there is a crowd waiting to get in. The people do wait, and patiently, too, because they know that when they get inside they are sure of seeing the whole show properly presented. The exhibition consists of one first-run film and one second-run film, with often a third reel, all of which are very well projected. The music in this theater is also worthy of mention. One thing that I noticed was the absence of the too common popular music being played to the pictures. Instead the pianist played music suited to the pictures, and her work was not marred by a noisy drummer, as is too often the case. Altogether the impression left by my visit to the Bell Theater is a most agreeable one, and my only regret is that there are not more moving picture theaters of this class.

A need which has long existed has at last been filled—a first-class theater downtown showing good Independent pictures well—and the theater to fill it is the La Salle, which is now devoted to vaudeville and pictures. The projection here is good, but as the La Salle Theater never was designed for a picture house, it suffers in one or two ways. The picture is thrown downward, at a drop of about 30 feet in an 80-foot throw, which makes the base of the picture seem much wider than the top. Also, the side lights have not been designed to illuminate a picture house, and they are allowed to shine on the entire lower half of the screen, materially affecting the brilliancy of the picture. The projecting light, in charge of William Ehlen, the operator, is very brilliant, and the picture is better illuminated than in most of the downtown houses. Mr. Ehlen is another man who disproved the "degenerate" theory, as he has been in the business for thirteen years, and does not yet show any signs of degeneration, unless it be that his statement that he "loves his machine, and cares for it a good deal" is such a sign.

I have noticed in a good many houses, of which I do not care to cite any examples, that their side lights are unshaded or imperfectly shaded red lamps. Since the city ordinances require the use of red lights at the exits, why not fully comply with them, and reserve the red lamps for exit lights? Red light constantly shining in the eyes of the audience is very irritating to them and causes much eye strain, while at the same time lights of this color do not really fulfill their mission of illuminating the aisles and seats of the theater. Moreover, if red light shines on the screen, it will introduce a false color into the picture. If unshaded lights must be used, deep green lamps will give sufficient light, while they will injure neither the picture on the screen nor the eyes of the audience.

The Monogram Theater, at Thirty-sixth and Halsted streets, about which I had occasion some time ago to say some rather unkind things on account of poor light and unsteadiness of its pictures, has changed hands, the new owner being A. Lewis. Mr. Lewis has coated the screen with aluminum paint, giving the picture some brilliancy. The throw at this theater is a very long one, about 110 feet, one of the longest in Chicago, and Ewing Mitchell, the operator, is to be congratulated on the picture he secures at that distance, the picture being steady, well lighted and sharply focussed. Mr. Mitchell has a good fault; he runs the pictures decidedly slow, which, though it gives rise to a little flicker, is far preferable to running at such a race-horse speed that the story of the film cannot be made out. Perhaps his ten years' of experience have taught him the advisability of not running too fast. The picture at the Monogram is now really excellent, when the throw and the disadvantage of having to use alternating current are considered.

Another house lately started in the same neighborhood, the Marion, is just north of Thirty-fifth street on Halsted street. The house was built for a theater, but owing to mismanagement it closed down some ten months ago. The present owners, Mr. and Mrs. Rose, are just starting their career as theater managers, but they are doing very well. Mrs. Rose is a picture lover of long standing and, as such, she does not believe in vaudeville. Therefore, it has not been introduced and pictures exclusively will be shown. This policy has been wise, as many people in the neighborhood who would not go into the ordinary "nickel theater" have been attracted to this house. Independent films are shown, as the competing houses are licensed, and high-class service is furnished by Eugene Cline, the pick of the Independent product being supplied. The picture on the screen is steady and well lighted, and the character of the entertainment is such as to invite one to come again. Mr. Rose is avoiding the errors which many managers who exhibit Independent films make—he shows other than Wild West ones and he is not showing old junk, consequently he is getting a steady patronage.

The Bon Ton Theater, at Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue, has been reopened after closing for the Summer to be remodeled. Many seats have been added, the screen being moved back to make room for them. A larger picture is secured by the increased throw, which is well lighted and steady, considering its size. The screen is coated with hygienic calcimine, which seems to me to give a better picture than the majority of the patented screen paints, the full photographic beauty of the pictures being brought out without any harshness, such as is present when aluminum is used for the curtain. Manager Nestle is determined to give his public the best possible show, and a very good orchestra is supplied by the George K. Spoor Company. The music of the orchestra enhances the effect of the pictures.

Mr. Riner, who is operator at the Scenic Theater, in Chicago, and who placed before the picture men a rubber composition ruler, which was mentioned recently in our columns, has a cement that is really perfect. This cement, known as "The Bulldog," was tried out before one of our representatives last week. A small piece of waste film was picked up and cut, the patch was prepared in the usual way and the Bulldog cement was applied. After several days the film was examined and the patch was found to be in perfect condition, the cement still in a hold-fast grip. This quality is due, no doubt, to the fact that Mr. Riner does not use ether in this preparation and the chemicals used are so compounded that they do not evaporate and leave a dry dust that will easily pull apart.

The Genre Transparency Company, of this city, recently made a shipment of 1,800 slides to Johannesburg, South Africa, through a World ad.

BOOKS AND CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS.

Every time that a new industry is well launched we see a crowd of sharks following it up with different schemes. The motion picture has not escaped these schemers and we see them coming from every direction with schemes they claim will benefit either the manufacturer, the renter, the exhibitor or the operator. Operators are called upon to part with some of their hard earned money on the ground that they should know more about their work and should either buy certain books or take a course from a correspondence school. While we believe that an operator cannot know too much, we feel it our duty to our subscribers to warn them not to buy all books offered them or pay for a correspondence tuition until they are sure that the information is genuine. Undoubtedly there are some good books and some good schools, but on the other hand, there are many fakirs and some of them would have the nerve to ask a big price on the ground that their worthless book is endorsed by the city inspector. Often, too often, the book is endorsed by no city official, yet the game works good. You buy the book, not that you need it, but for the sake to keep solid with the inspector in your district. The same can be said of many schools; so we advise the operator seeking more instruction on the running of a projecting machine and appliances, to seek the opinion of some competent person on the value of certain books and of certain correspondence schools. FILM SHIPPING BOXES.

Although many boxes have been placed on the market, none stood the abuses of Mr. Expressman. Tin or galvanized iron boxes have proven the less durable, as they get out of shape and break in no time. Wooden boxes have stood the strain better, yet they are far from satisfactory. In our Chicago office there is now on exhibition a box of a new composition, that has been tested by a number of film exchanges and proves to be the most durable and economic box ever offered. It is a round box of the size of a regular reel, made of a composition of fibre, with a well fitting lid and a strong wire handle. The price is remarkably cheap. Boxes are made for 2, 3 and more reels, according to the needs of the exchanges using them. Slide boxes are also made of the same material. The concussion of a metallic or wooden box during a fall is so great as to break a number of slides, while if the expressman drops one of the new boxes, the fibre will give and consequently reduce the concussion to a minimum. It is stated that while not more expensive than the wooden boxes, these fibre boxes will outlast any other make.

THE "PERFECTO" GAS MAKING OUTFIT.

"Keeping everlastingly at it brings success." This is one of the favorite mottoes of S. Pearlman, manager of the Capital Merchandise Company, 225 Dearborn street, Chicago. This company is placing on the market a new gas making outfit called the "Perfecto" and it is all that its name implies. It is neat and compact, weighing but 15 pounds, which is less than half the weight of any similar outfit. Mr. Pearlman claims superiority for the "Perfecto," and he bases his claims on a few of the following excellent features it possesses: The chemicals can be charged many hours before the machine is used; it is equipped with stop cocks, obviating the necessity of throwing the ether away when moving the outfit; and, unlike any other make, it is equipped with a safety valve which can be placed either way on the hoses without any danger of combustion. These few features alone should make the "Perfecto" a winner from the very start.

YES, INDEED, "THAT'S GOING SOME."

The express drivers' strike in New York City and a "dope" writer for a Chicago film manufacturer are responsible for the following tale told to a representative of the World: Owing to the above mentioned strike, the Selig Company is sending all their prints of current releases to New York via Twentieth Century Limited by special messenger, who delivers them to their New York office personally. That would make a fairly good press notice if it were told in connection with some burlesque show, but film manufacturer—no, back up, that's a little too strong. It's awful, some of the things they try to "slip over" on us.

THE MOTIOGRAPH WEARS.

It may be of interest to users of the Motiograph moving picture machine to hear that J. W. Erwin, the celebrated lecturer, has recently left the office of Edward Kemp, in San Francisco, for his annual tour with the original Motiograph mechanism, purchased nearly three years ago, and which has been in constant use for that time. Mr. Erwin has been on the Pacific Coast for the past three months obtaining material for new lectures and incidentally giving his equipment an entire overhauling, after almost 50,000 miles of travel. The fact that the mechanism for the projection of the motion pictures is shipped in the trunk, the same as any other apparatus, instead of being carried by hand as usual, makes it especially interesting to learn that not the slightest repairs were found necessary, and this in spite of the fact that one-night stands were the rule.

THE PRESS AGENT.

A certain near-editor recently took a fling at the World for daring to belittle the press agents who supplied him with free music for his hand organ. Also when we published, on May 7, an article by "Lux Graphicus" and a cartoon on the excessive use of advertising literature, a few manufacturers and especially their press agents became more or less offended.

We knew our ground at the time and it is always safe ground to stand upon—Public Sentiment. Many exhibitors had said to us: "We do not care for these bulletins in which the manufacturers blow their own horns. They can not be relied on."

To gratify personal vanity, manufacturers seemed to vie with each other as to who would publish the swellest bulletin. Empire manufacturers, thinking that fine feathers make fine birds, began to put into expensive bulletins the money they ought to have put into their films. The effect has been grotesque. The exhibitor has done some real kicking, and shrewd business men like Geo. Kleine, W. N. Selig and the Lubin Company have listened to public opinion and have gone back to the popular one sheet bulletin. The Kalem people never did plunge heavily in bulletins, but we remember their four page closely printed story of the film—a condensed novel, frequently mentioning scenes that did not appear in the film. Now the Kalem Company issue the most popular bulletin of all—a one sheet with a large picture from the film, the title in large type, and a very brief outline of the plot.

The Biograph Company consistently stuck to their plain single sheet, with no blatant trumpeting of their films, yet selling more than any other—and why? Because the Biograph press agent uses his brains in helping to make the Biograph pictures what they are, not in trying to convince the public that they are what they are not.

The latest thing in manufacturers' bulletins, emanating from an Independent house, is so vapidly blatant that it caps the climax. It is tastefully printed on expensive paper and it is a pity to see so much money wasted that could be better applied to the purchase of scenarios. There are hundreds of writers ready to supply stories above the usual drivel, but to secure this talent the manufacturers will have to pay more than the usual price. Then the press agent's palaver will not be needed to sell their products.

IN MEMORIAM.

We note with the most sincere regret the death of James Donaldson, proprietor of the Old South and New Washington Theaters, Boston. Mr. Donaldson's death is a blow of more than ordinary importance to moving picture exhibitors. A very successful and wealthy business man of forty years' prestige in this city, Mr. Donaldson first became identified with the Old South Theater, Washington street, two years ago. Last year he opened the New Washington Theater. In this time he has often aided the Boston exhibitors by means of his prestige and affluence, as he was much interested in the business itself, apart from his own personal part in it. Men as representative and of as high standing as was Mr. Donaldson are always additions to any line of trade; and he was exceedingly welcome when he first entered this line. His interests in the two theaters will doubtless be carried on by his heirs. Only this Summer the Old South was enlarged and remodeled at an expense of $25,000. Requiescat in pace.

MOVING PICTURES AS A CURE FOR INSANITY.

To amuse the patients in the big Overbrook hospital, at Newark, N. J., for the insane, the authorities will install a complete moving picture and vaudeville show. The medical directors will select the pictures the patients are allowed to see. It is believed that the innovation will have a marked beneficial effect.

FRONTIER FILMS IN CANADA.

The widespread interest in Western pictures is apparent to every photoplay theater manager, and it goes without saying that the attendance figures have been broken in every town where the Indian and cowboy pictures taken at Cheyenne this year have been shown. The Ontario Film Exchange, of Windsor, Ont., certainly scored a scoop when they secured the privileges for all Canada.

DEFENDER GOING SOME.

It is the public's misfortune and the exhibitor's loss if Defender products are not made available to them through the exchanges. We arrived at this conclusion after viewing two forthcoming Defender releases. The photography was excellent, some scenes being especially striking in conception and beautiful in execution. The plays themselves were not of the clap-trap drama variety, but clean and interesting problems of every-day life; stories that please, of things that may have happened. If the Defender Company follow on these lines and give due attention to the minor details that go to make perfection, their pictures should steadily grow in public favor.

MOVING PICTURES OF INDUSTRIAL VALUE BESIDES PLEASURE GIVING.

The strange yet welcome information comes from Tacoma, Washington, that in one of the largest hop yards in the State, the owner, Herman Klauber, has installed a moving picture place for the purpose of providing entertainment for the great number of hop-pickers employed by him at this season of the year. The result has not only proved satisfactory but beneficial.

Formerly the people used to wander away, often long distances, to the surrounding towns for the necessary relaxation and amusement; now, they have all the pleasure they need right in their midst at a saving of money, time and trouble, besides which they are always on hand and ready for work in the morning.

The economic value here is also worth considering and taking all the advantages into consideration we are sure there are many people and communities similarly situated who can and will profit by this example. Employers, too, will not be slow in noting the advantage of the "working people's theater" and many similar instances to this recorded above will soon be noticeable.

GROWTH OF THE YANKEE.

It is interesting to note the forward strides that have been taken by certain Independent manufacturers. Particularly is this true of the Yankee Film Company which is, perhaps, one of the youngest of the group and whose progress has been delayed somewhat by conditions under which very few, if any, of the other manufacturers had to contend with.

Beginning modestly, without flare of trumpets, the single, Monday release of the Yankee Company has gradually wormed its way into the good graces of the trade until, through the sheer quality and popularity of Yankee films, they have reached the point where more releases are demanded. This is particularly gratifying at this time in view of the large number of Independent reels available to the trade. "Bill" Steiner, director general of the Yankee Company, just returned from a tour of exchanges in the Central and Western States. When interviewed the other day he waxed enthusiastic over the results of his trip and said he was "confident the demand for a second release was genuine, so confident, in fact, that he had invested an additional fifteen thousand dollars in equipment and accessories to make his position sure. When I told them I would give them another reel if they wanted it, they all seemed glad. The exchanges are supporting me, too, and I'm going to press every available dollar into service to make my product the leading topic of moving picture conversation throughout the country."

The World believes in the sincerity of "Bill" Steiner and fully expects to see him at the top of the heap some day.

Meanwhile, he is doing his best to make excellent films and everyone knows it. What more can we say?

"The Queen of the Nihilists," the Yankee Company's release of November 25, is the first picture to be sent out by this company under its two releases a week system. The company very properly features the picture which deserves notice at the hands of the Independent exchange and exhibitor, whom we strongly recommend to obtain "The Queen of the Nihilists." It will be popular with American audiences, which include an enormous number of Russians. Briefly, "The Queen of the Nihilists" is a typical story of Imperial Russian persecution of progressive people, such as is taking place this very moment in the domains of the Czar. We have the knouting of innocent people; the creation of Nihilism by oppression; martial law; plotting and counterplotting; military despotism and duplicity; Siberia; the evolution of a Nihilist queen in the shape of a woman who, as a child, suffered at the hands of the oppressor; and finally, the arrival of the queen and her lover in this, the land of freedom, an incident realistically depicted in a trip up New York Bay. "The Queen of the Nihilists" is full of strong, healthy melodramatic meat. It is exciting, genuine, thrilling, holds your attention from first to last. It is right down fine drama, well acted, well photographed, and in our opinion will be popular wherever shown. Here and there it is, perhaps, a bit stagy, a fact which perhaps heightens rathers than depresses the striking effects aimed at.

Price $1.50. Postage free.

NEW LUBIN BULLETINS.

Answering the demand from exhibitors for a bulletin sheet printed upon one side of the paper only, the bulletins of the Lubin Manufacturing Company now appear in the form of large sheets carrying a cut eight by six inches with a large block title and a succinct description in large type. The release date and other data appears at the bottom, where it may be marked out or cut off, as may be desired, by exhibitors who do not use first run.

The bulletins are shipped rolled in mailing tubes that unsightly creases may be avoided, and will make a most attractive lobby display.

PATHE FRERES NOT IN A TRUST.

(Contributed.)

An important case has just been decided in the Ohio State Court of Appeals in a matter in which Pathe Freres were alleged to be in an unlawful conspiracy with other manufacturers in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act and the Valentine Act in the State of Ohio.

About two and a half years ago Pathe Freres brought suit against the Co-operative Film Syndicate of North Baltimore, Ohio, in the Court of Common Pleas of Wood County, Ohio, for the recovery of the purchase price of films. The defendants through their lawyer asked damages of Pathe Freres in the sum of $20,000. Judgment was given in favor of Pathe Freres for the price of the goods sold and delivered, and Pathe Freres also won out on the question of the alleged trust, on the appeal which took place a few days ago. This judgment was confirmed in its entirety.

"LUX" COMEDIES TO THE FORE.

As if in response to the articles and letters which have recently appeared in our pages on the dearth of comedy subjects, the Lux Company are putting out some very attractive comedy films, two of which we saw during the past week. If these pictures would not quite make a cat laugh, the humor of them is sure to hold and interest any moving picture audience. The first of them is entitled "Necessity, the Mother of Invention," and it shows how a needy artist and his wife use a lay figure for mendicant purposes in order to replenish their exhausted treasury. When it is understood that the dressed up lay figure resembles a very old man and is mistaken for a real person, the opportunities for fun will be easily realized. After a series of adventures, the lay figure is returned to the artist, who, with his wife, sits down to enjoy a meal, as the result of the experiment. A clever comedy idea very skilfully worked out and acted, and nicely photographed.

The other picture should be popular in all moving picture houses, because it shows "Bill as an Operator." Bill in his booth plays the wildest conceivable pranks with his films, so that the audience and the manager of the house are sometimes driven to distress. Bill also is in love. Bill is really a very funny operator, and what he does is all very laughable. In real life what the maladroit operator mostly does is stupid or tragic. The real operator in real life is only too often a hopeless proposition without even a laugh in him. Bill, however, has the saving grace of being genuinely funny and doing genuinely funny things, and this Lux film of him therefore is assured of a good reception.

Letters to the Editors.

WHY SO MUCH DRAMA?

Philadelphia, Pa., November 3, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—What seems to be wrong with the Independent manufacturers? Do they imagine that people go to the theater to use up their handkerchiefs, wiping their noses and drying their tears over the "turr'ble" stories running wild on the curtain as moving pictures?

Just look at the enclosed clipping of this week's releases: Monday—3 releases, 3 dramatics. Tuesday—3 releases, 1 dramatic, 1 comedy, 1 unknown quality. Wednesday—4 releases, 4 dramatic. Thursday—4 releases, 2 dramatic. Friday—4 releases, 4 dramatic. Saturday—4 releases, 3 dramatic.

Now don't you think, Mr. Editor, that a little more comedy would be appreciated by the suffering public?

I leave it to you.

A READER.

[Yes. We quite agree with you and so do others, as you will notice in the same issue letters from two exhibitors calling for more comedies and scenics.—Eds. M. P. W.]

THE TEST—ARGUMENT VS. RESULTS.

Principles and institutions are tried by experience and their fitness to human nature and need.

Our educational system and methods must submit to be tested by the kind of men and women they produce.

Our political institutions by the amount and the kind of liberty and benefit they produce for the people.

Institutions are to be weighed by what they produce and not by what we think of them. Which weighs more: results or opinion to the contrary?

Suppose we apply this test to the every-day business. Bring it a little closer home—right down to the moving picture business.

Is associated effort to better trade conditions to be tried by personal opinion or by its results? If associated effort has produced results beneficial to the trade, is personal opinion to the contrary of any weight?

Someone may have a personal opinion that men cannot fly. Men are flying just the same, however, in spite of the personal opinion.

Someone may have a personal opinion that a local association of moving picture exchanges will be of no benefit to its members. In spite of that opinion, however, the trade has reaped a decided benefit from such local associations.

Trade associations, both local and national, have been tried for years by their results. If they were not productive of good they would have gone out of existence long ago.

Someone may say: "We had one and it was no good." Was it the fault of the association or the individuals who composed it that it failed? If a man fails in business, is the business to blame or the man?

Think it over and try the "Work together" method.

Yours very truly,

SAMUEL STERN.

WHY VAUDEVILLE IS DETRIMENTAL.

As the World has published so many opinions as to the value of vaudeville in a moving picture theater, I am moved to commit my ideas on that subject to paper.

Vaudeville, per se, is not necessarily harmful to the motion picture, in fact when used discreetly and very moderately, may be an aid to that disease called "box-office-itis." When the ordinary moving picture manager decides to intersperse his program of pictures and songs with vaudeville his first care is to reckon out the additional cost to his running expenses. He finds the additional expense quite a considerable item. He decides he can not stand this unaccustomed strain. He ponders—How shall this be overcome? Why, that is easy!

The theater has been running four reels of film, two new and two old, also three or four illustrated singers. He decides to run only one new reel, using three commercial reels, and to pay less money for his singers—won't the vaudeville make up for this degeneration?

Then there is the type of manager who features his vaudeville to the entire exclusion of his pictures, using only the poorest junk. When a moving picture theater decides to give a little vaudeville, it must be given gratis; that is to say, the pictures and songs must be of the same quality and quantity as before. The people who pay their dimes do so to see pictures, plenty of pictures, good pictures. To this everybody agrees.

No theater charging 5 cents can afford vauedville, but one charging 10 cents and doing a good business can use one or two acts to advantage, as it is a relaxation from the intensity of the cinematograph. The writer believes that the above causes are the chief reasons that vaudeville is at the present time detrimental. As far as New England is concerned, he is sure of his ground; apart from that, he can not be certain, but the chances are that one part of this country is the same as the other in this respect.

A NEW ENGLAND EXHIBITOR.

"PHOTOPLAY."

Noticing some correspondence upon the new name "Photoplay," it is to be hoped that a thorough interest may be aroused and no doubt many valuable suggestions will flow through the columns of the World.

The writer is very anxious to hear from our English friends across the Atlantic, as from their viewpoint we shall, without doubt, receive some very valuable remarks, whether favorable or unfavorable, they will be alike welcome.

While agreeing with your editorial that in the absence of a "newly coined" word the selection of one name may prove a difficult matter, progress will be made if in the adoption in part of photoplay or any other name some of the commoner names now used may be eliminated.

In making these comments, however, the writer's object is not only to carry out your idea of using your columns for the purpose of airing opinions, but also to suggest at once the advisability of starting a campaign of names which shall be as worldwide as your circulation, hoping to derive therefrom either an endorsement of photoplay, or the selection of some other name which the people at large may approve.

In furtherance of this plan and to start a live interest, the writer suggests the name theagraph as one most eminently fitting for the future use in describing moving picture work. The bare suggestion of any name must carry with it reason for its adoption, or provoke reason for its rejection. In theagraph or any such immediately similar word we have a name which would be alike useful the world over, in any country and in any language; it is at once ancient, modern, of pure origin and perfect adaptation.

The most value of such a name is that in one word it both means and designates the motion picture show, theater, amusement place or lecture hall where the cinematograph is used; it would always parallel the theater and never conflict with it; and, even as theaters may have a proper name to distinguish them, as the American or Metropolitan, so could the theagraph.

Again, a name of this nature applies to every possible use now known and what is more important, which may ever be known, in the present or future of moving picture work or possibilities; it is also self-explanatory and needs no interpreter; is euphonious and joins good company and lends its own value to the company it joins when linked with theater or opera house; or, in plainer language, to borrow the commonplace simile of the judges of photoplay, it will be as easy for people to say, "let us go to the theagraph" as to say "let us go to the theater" or "let us go to the opera."

Is it worth while saying that such a name possesses both character and dignity? While people may object to this name or suggest another, they cannot belittle the nature of theagraph, and while it is not presented in a final or positive sense, it is here presented for honest candid opinions, and with the object of starting in your valuable paper what the writer trusts may be a picture worldwide search for the best name to carry forward the greatest benefactor of twentieth century developments.

EXHIBITOR.

THE FITTEST ARE SURVIVING.

Aurora, Ill., November 2, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I am a reader of the World and every week read some very good articles on music used in 5-cent amusement houses.

While in Elgin the other day I dropped into the Globe Theater. As I went in the door I heard someone singing "Dixie;" however, when I was seated I wondered what kind of a place I was in as then all was still except the piano and drums, which were softly playing that good old air. I soon learned that the Imp's "Dixie" was on the screen and as the titles which were set in music appeared, the pianist and drummer (both ladies) sang what was on the screen. It was so well done you would have thought they had rehearsed it for a week, but as they get their films the same day they use them, that was not possible.

The beauty of it was they played and sang with feeling according to the run of the picture, and best of all they finished the picture by singing "America." I have been in hundreds of moving picture houses but never was in one that I enjoyed more than that one.

The house was packed but everyone was so orderly you could have heard a pin drop as the clear soprano and alto rang out that beloved old song, "America."

The Globe has a mirror screen and a good operator, as the pictures were perfect. All the fault I found about the place was there is no sign, nothing to show it is the Globe. I learned that from the little "Globe Hustler," who directed me there. Mr. Sulivan is a good manager and knows his business when it comes to hiring help and renting films. He has the latest Independent pictures and, altogether, it is worth the 5-cent admission any day in the week.

I wish a few of the poor managers would take a peep into a good house once in a while and learn something.

Yours very truly,

D. S.,

Pittsburg, Pa., November 8, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I am much interested in Mr. Neff's remarks in this week's World under the title "The Call to Arms." Mr. Neff's remarks have, to me, a deeper meaning than appears on the surface.

Yours truly,

C. R.

FROM A MEMBER OF THE PUBLIC.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I find the Moving Picture World to be one of the publications of which I never miss a copy. Though not interested in motion pictures save as a spectator, I find the publication uniformly excellent and interesting, though I was some time in discovering the oppositeness of the page by "much grassycuss." I tried the remarks about the "Beautiful City of Prague" on some of my friends, and from the way they took them I concluded that this must be the comedy end of the publication.

Every day I look over the bulletin board at the first-run theater on Fourteenth street near Broadway and sometimes I am rewarded by finding on view what I am looking for—a comedy or scenic, to see one of which I am quite willing to sit through one or two of the other kind, the kind which was well described, I thought, in the article printed from the Los Angeles Times as an "irritating playlet." I have frequently sounded the person who might be sitting next me, and find that they usually are of about the same opinion as myself; they prefer a funny or industrial or travel picture to almost any other form of entertainment, but find that to experience that pleasure they must take a very considerable dose of the other kind.

I have seen very many "dramatic" pictures, but do not remember to have been gripped by a single one of them. And it should not be forgotten that the class of people to whom these dramatics are supposed especially to appeal may weary of them after a time.

There is a man who works with me and who has been putting in his Saturday afternoons at picture shows for a long while. The other Monday he was telling me of having been at an amateur baseball game on the previous Saturday. Questioning him as to his desertion from his regular diversion of a picture show, he said, "O, it makes me sick. A lot of doggoned rot." This from a Scotsman with all the caution and avoidance of a decided opinion so characteristic of the race.

Why the manufacturers do not turn out more American scenics I cannot understand. Surely there is another public for this sort of entertainment than that which is typified by say, the people walking on Fourteenth street on a Sunday evening.

We all know dozens of the sort of people I am thinking of, and there are unnumbered thousands of them in the smaller cities and towns, well meaning, wishing to be informed, easily able to spend the little money it costs to see a moving picture show one or two times a week, but certainly not financially "up to" the high priced legitimate stage. But they surely did not patronize the now happily defunct "ten-twenty-thirty" melodrama in its day, and no more will the same sort of stuff on the screen attract them.

Yours truly,

FRED VAN BUREN.

LET "EXCELSIOR" BE THE CUE.

Binghamton, N. Y., November 8, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—I am not a moving picture exhibitor, but an ardent admirer of moving pictures, and I read every number of the Moving Picture World as soon as it is on the market, and I notice with much interest your feeling toward raising the standard of the business. I am a "drummer" and also an amateur singer, consequently I am much interested in the musical end.

My territory lies through Eastern New York and Western Vermont and of course I have my favorite theaters, and one of them is the Dreamland Theater, in Barre, Vt. About two months ago, when there, the pictures were put on the curtain in as steady, bright and plain a way as any we seldom see, and accompanied by suitable music—some of the classics being used—and in the Edison pictures I found their cues, artistically used, making the impression that good and suitable music always does. The only lacking thing was the singer and he was a new one from the previous visit. Good voice, but too light.

About a week ago I made another visit. Found the pictures unsteady, dim and long in intermissions; music accompanying them "haphazard," and I was much disappointed; and on inquiry found "a change of help." The only redeeming quality was the return of a former singer, a strong, pleasing baritone that can be heard in all parts of the house.

Now what is the cause of this? I find in my travels many such circumstances, and have come to the conclusion that it is the "money problem." The salaries of the good people are of course higher, and the majority of the exhibitors are looking for the "cheapest" help when they should be looking for the "best." As I said at the start, I am not an exhibitor, neither do I know anything of the parties mentioned, and this is merely a plea for good substantial salaries; for then and not till then will the moving picture be artistically produced. For how can good musicians afford to work at this business when they can earn more and be better appreciated elsewhere.

Think it over, exhibitors

A MOVING PICTURE LOVER.

THE "ART" OF THE PRODUCER.

Sparta, Ill., October 28, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I noticed an article in a theatrical journal in which Hal Reid opines that the picture business is on the toboggan at last. In the article it is mentioned that he secured a contract with one of the largest manufacturers (Selig) to write and stage productions. Upon entering his duties he asserts that owing to the elimination of scenes depicting "murder," "knifing," "kidnapping," etc., he was practically at a loss to specialize his particular line of art.

It seems to me that Mr. Reid has an ax to grind. If not, why does he try to make us believe that on account of his inability to depict his blood and thunder the moving picture game is taking the count? Can it be possible that he disagrees with the National Censorship Board in the matter of uplift? Mr. Reid also mentioned that it was far more difficult for him to write one scenario for pictures than it was to write and stage several "meller dramers." What is the answer? Are our manufacturers, censorship boards, etc., after all, wrong in the uplift movement? Or would it be safest to go back to the old Deadwood Dick style of pictures? Truly there is no answer to such a foolish question other than congratulations to the present day methods. People sometimes see things as they wish, that is they imagine they see such. We all dream at times and perhaps we see our competitors go down and out, leaving the field all to ourselves, then comes the awaking—it was only a dream. I realize how nice it would be for the "Ten-Ton Door" companies to have no obstacles in their way, but nevertheless I cannot see the beginning of the end, as Mr. Reid would have it, of the silent drama.

It seems peculiar, but it's a fact, that with very few exceptions, playwrights and authors have failed utterly in their attempts to shine as directors, producers or scenario artists and even actors of renown have failed to set the world afire in their capacity before the camera. I have watched them perform both in pictures and on the stage, and I believe they are as much out of place in pictures as one of our camera stars would be in speaking parts on the stage.

JOS. C. HEWITT.

THE PICTURE IN WASHINGTON.

Washington, D. C., October 31, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Referring to your article "Washington and the Picture" in a late number, will you kindly tell the writer that our pictures are not jumpy unless it is the fault of the makers. I have been in the picture business for the past ten years and know when jumpiness is due to the projecting machine and when to the camera. I could name some manufacturers who are at fault and especially when outdoor scenes are taken. If they would only take the trouble to weight down the camera we would have less jumpiness on the screen.

Yours truly,

SIDNEY JULIAN JACOBSON,
Mgr. and Chief Operator, Palace Theater.

ANOTHER "TROUBLE DEPARTMENT."

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—One of the best, and at least the most essential feature of your valuable paper is the "Trouble Department." Every one interested reads much valuable advice week by week, for which they are very grateful. May I with propriety suggest another, the "General Advice Department," wherein could be asked and answered all kinds of questions applying to every phase of the moving pictures outside the technical—moral, artistic, educational, religious, financial, etc., etc.? Your correspondent feels such a department might often prove a friend in need to many an anxious mind. Shall be glad to know what you think, Mr. Editor.

Very truly,

INQUIRER.

[Inquirer, the Moving Picture World is conducted for that very purpose. Send along your queries and we will reply to them to the best of our ability.—Eds M. P. W.]

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Don W. McClellan, of Pekin, Ill., has purchased of the Consolidated Amusement Company, of Bloomington, Ill., the Idylhour Theater, Pekin, and will continue it as a moving picture theater.

The Airdome, First avenue, Sterling, Ill., is expending $4,000 in improvements for the Winter. The alterations include a brick front and steam heating system.

The new Empress Theater, at Peoria, is near completion and when opened will be one of the prettiest picture houses in the Middle West. The auditorium is nearly square, with a lofty arch dome over the center. The floors rise back from one angle of the house forming a natural amphitheater. The proprietors are Seaver & Robinson. Vernon C. Seaver is owner of Al Fresco Park, Young Buffalo Wild West circus, a 22-car show and a dozen other successful amusement enterprises. Mrs. W. W. Robinson, who will manage the house, is the widow of the late W. W. Robinson, former city editor of the Peoria Star, who gave his life to prevent a panic in the Princess Theater, a moving picture show, over a year ago. Seaver and Robinson, in a little room back of the curtain, were consulting plans for a new house when fire broke out. Robinson rushed to the stage and calmed the audience, then in the first throes of a panic, and no one was injured, but the effect of the smoke upon his lungs brought on an attack, and he died soon after reaching his home.

Because his seating capacity of 300 is not large enough, Manager Siegfried, of the Nickel Bijou, at Decatur, Ill., closed it down until he could connect the room up with the adjoining building, upon which he had secured a five-year lease. Siegfried is building the New Plymouth, a moving picture house, in Minneapolis, Minn., which will seat 1,200 people. This house will be managed by Mrs. Siegfried. It will be entirely fireproof, with a color scheme of mahogany woodwork to match the chairs and piano, against green and tan walls, and the ceiling in cream brown, tan and green

The White Hall, Ill., city council has passed an ordinance against exhibiting any prize fight or any immoral, lewd or obscene moving picture.

Peter Gingery will open a moving picture show in the I. O. O. F. Building, at Mt. Pulaski, Ill., having three entrances from the show into his ice cream parlor in the room adjoining.

R. W. Heivly has sold the Crown Theater, at Petersburg, Ill., to Mrs. W. J. Cheaney, who has placed her son, Don, in charge. A Saturday matinee for farmers is a feature of this small city show.

A moving picture show will be opened in the White Building, at Belle Plains, Ia.

J. B. Shierk, of Bridgewater, S. D., and D. F. Shierk, of Lena, Ill., have purchased of W. S. Mogle, of Freeport, Ill., the moving picture theater at Polo, Ill.

George W. Myers, manager of the Gem Theater, at Clinton, Ill., gave vaudeville a week's trial, according to the press of that city, and returned to the moving picture fold.

The Star Theater, of Clinton, Ill., has been redecorated with mural paintings in the lobby and on the side walls of the auditorium; a mirror screen has been installed and, with a ten-cent admission for a picture show, the management announces it will continue to be known as the "House of Features."

The city council of Robinson, Ill., raised the license fee of moving picture shows charging five cents from $3 to $20 per month, and for shows charging over that amount from $5 to $30 a month. The only person affected is G. A. Sharrock, of the Vaudette, who declares he will not pay this fee. As a provisional contract existed between Mr. Sharrock and the I. O. O. F., whereby the order's building would be leased for ten years for show purposes, the lodge has appointed a committee to confer with the uplifting city legislators.

Manager Eagleston, of the Grand, at Charleston, Ill., has been remodeling the lobby and his office. He has recently installed a new No. 6 Power's Cameragraph.

Members of the Lincoln, Ill., city council and energetic reporters have managed to pretty well impress upon the general public that the moving picture shows of that city are death-traps. The following excerpt of the report of the proceedings should prove reassuring to heads of families:

"Member Schuster told of his inspection, with the chief of police, of the moving picture shows in the city, where the rear exits were blocked with chairs and boxes, so in case of fire it would be impossible for the patrons to escape. It was also stated that some of the operators smoke cigars and cigarettes around the combustible films. The councilmen became aroused on the subject of protecting the lives of innocent people, and on motion of Member Watson, the city attorney and members of the fire and water committee were instructed to take up the matter, and if the ordinances were lax in these regards to present new measures to the council."

According to decisions handed down by Circuit Judges W. B. Homer and Moses N. Sale, moving picture shows will have to dispense with platforms or stages if they wish to operate under the present ordinance of the city of St. Louis. In all probability the exhibitors will unite to appeal from the decision.

"The unusual thing" seems to be responsible for the troubles of Albert Lynn, of St. Louis, as reported by The Times, of that city:

"On account of a rumor that he had become a prohibitionist, the attendance at Albert Lynn's moving picture theater shrunk from 300 a night to a doubtful 40. Then Lynn went before a notary public and duly made oath that never in his life had he ever signed a paper favoring the adoption of the prohibition amendment.

"This affidavit, secured behind glass in a frame, hangs outside his moving picture show, The Nightingale, 2909 South Broadway, and is intended to assure his patrons they have misjudged him.

"Lynn has been running the show for three years. Business was good until recently. Then the attendance began dropping off steadily. Lynn made an investigation and learned that the report had been spread broadcast he had placed himself on record as a prohibitionist.

"This was the cause of his drooping attendance.

"Before taking up his present business he was a glass blower. He made bottles for a brewery, and said he never was connected with anything that savored of prohibition."

HIGHER EDUCATION THE NEED.

A fourteen-year-old boy in Manhattan pleaded guilty to robbery, burglary, grand larceny, assault and receiving stolen property. He explains that he saw a moving picture depicting crime, in one of the theaters devoted to that entertainment, went right home and got a revolver with which to sally forth as a highwayman.

No doubt this boy reads the newspapers. While the discussion of moving pictures is on, a majority of juvenile criminals will make a feature of the picture shows in the confessions they give for newspaper publication. There was a time when billboards advertising melodramas were the fashionable source of temptation. Before that the young heroes usually claimed a consumption of incredible quantities of cigarettes; and before that it was the proper thing to boast of reading dime novels. In a few years it will be something else.

Good boys are not likely to be driven suddenly to crime by seeing a picture. But nevertheless the pictures of burglaries and train robberies and murders ought to be suppressed. Those who like them are injured by them, and there are plenty of patrons who are disgusted by them. It is a case for common sense. Not all murder scenes need be prohibited. Shakespeare's play of "Julius Caesar" has been effectively shown in moving pictures. But flathouse robberies and city street holdups cannot possibly please any but a taste already vicious.—Brooklyn Standard Union.

Among the late installations of new machines is the beautiful Colonial Theater, of Ft. Wayne, Ind., which has a seating capacity upwards of 500 people, which has installed the latest model Motiograph. Other houses of importance are the Empress Theater of Peoria, also the Fox Theater of Aurora and the Tavern and Crystal Theaters of Joilet, all of which have installed Motiographs.

ANNOUNCEMENT SLIDES, 1 CENT EACH.

Up-to-date theaters use them for announcing future programmes, for song chorus slides when the chorus slide is missing, for business advertising slides—in fact, for anything you desire to say to the audience. They are written on colored gelatin with a pen and ink or typewriter. They look well. Anyone can make them. Takes three minutes to make a slide. For three dollars ($3.00) cash with order, I send by express (charges not prepaid) as follows: 24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. F. H. RICHARDSON, No. 6 Bradhurst avenue, New York.

BIOGRAPH.

THE TROUBLESOME BABY.—Martin is hurriedly called to High Beach to close a contract for a big deal with the president of a construction company who is stopping there. He begs his wife to accompany him, but she pleads not having yet the new suit she has ordered, so he makes the trip alone intending not to stay any longer than necessary. Arriving there, he transacts his business at once and rushes to catch the next train out, missing it by a hair, which forces him to stop over several hours for the next. Meanwhile, Mrs. Martin has received her suit and follows her hubby on the next train. To while away the time, Martin takes a turn on the beach, taking a seat beside a lady with a baby in her arms, who, without looking up, thinks her husband is still occupying the seat and absent-mindedly places the baby in his arms while she runs off after her other child. Well, you can see the trouble that is cooked up for Martin when he meets his wife. However, he gets rid of it after awhile, and when it gets back to its mother explanations bring peace.

LOVE IN QUARANTINE.—Harold and Edith are betrothed, but, as the course of true love never runs smooth, they quarrel. Edith leaves him at the gate in a huff, but "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," so he follows her into the house to find the doctor attending the maid, who, it transpires, is ill of a contagious disease. The doctor has telephoned the case to the Health Department so the house is quarantined at once and the peevish lovers are destined to stay under the same roof until the ban is raised. This elates Harold, but the worst is yet to come. They both must be vaccinated. Edith's mother plans to help things along by having Harold pretend illness to arouse Edith's sympathy. The scheme is working finely when Edith discovers the hoax. Still, the ice is broken and the lovers' quarrel is quashed.

EDISON COMPANY.

THE LITTLE STATION AGENT.—The station agent is a girl about nineteen years of age. Joe Allen and Albert Hill, two freight men, are particularly smitten with her charms.

She smiles at the one and bows to the other with equal womanly grace. Joe Allen is far in the lead as regards her affections. This fact is also revealed to Albert Hill. He is in a particularly dangerous frame of mind when, while setting the brakes of the box cars while going down a steep grade, he meets Joe on top of the train. The little station agent immediately becomes the subject of a conversation which waxes into a bitter argument—hot words pass and a blow is struck. The cars go dashing on, the two men reeling and swaying in a terrific struggle. A blow with a lantern knocks the favored one, Joe, unconscious.

Albert thinks he has killed him and, realizing the punishment that will follow if he is found out he determines to destroy the evidence of the crime by cutting the cars loose and letting them run wild, that they may be dashed to pieces and Joe with them. This will enable him to hide his guilt. The cars are cut loose and go tearing down the mountain grade, but Joe soon awakes to consciousness to find himself on a mad runaway freight. He strains every nerve and cord in his body tugging at the brakes, but to no avail. A glimmer of hope arrives as he dashes by a way-station. The station master hears his cry, and rushing into his office sends a wire to the little station agent. A moment and the news stuns her, but it means Joe's life—it means more than that—it means the safety of the Overland Limited!

Ten minutes have hardly passed before we see the track superintendent, the little station agent and an engineer dashing out of the round house on a high-speed emergency track automobile and away to head off the oncoming freight. Now we are shown the train dashing around dangerous curves and now the track automobile running for life, love and humanity's sake. At last the siding switch is reached—a moment only and the runaway freight is sidetracked and safe. In the next instant the Overland Limited comes tearing down the track and off in the distance.

No one ever knew who had saved their lives, or how near to death they nearly were. Joe knew to whom he owed his life, however, and the next day when Albert Hill was arrested the little station agent slipped her hand into Joe's; and somehow we are made to feel that it is just these little tragic moments of life that bring two souls together.

A TRIP OVER THE ROCKY AND SELKIRK MOUNTAINS IN CANADA.—We start upon our trip over the C. P. R. at Calgary, a beautiful city which stands sentinel on the watch line between mountain and prairie. Soon we find ourselves fairly among the mountains, with all their grandeur, tunnels, torrents and towering peaks. A few moments' stop at Laggan; a glimpse at Lake Louise, the beauty spot of America; then down Fraser Canyon and the Selkirk Mountains. A visit to the National Park, containing the largest herd of buffaloes in the world, and so on until we have passed the two great steamers, the Princess Charlotte and the Princess Victoria, off Otto Point on their way to Victoria. Here, at the capital of British Columbia, we pause to view the harbor, the parliamentary building and the city itself. Four hundred and forty feet of beauty, and every picture is a gem in itself.

THE LASSIE'S BIRTHDAY.—The scene takes place in a garden back of a summer house. The lass herself is not up when the story begins, and the first to appear are two children, who scamper off in search of suitable gifts for her, looking up and laughing at the closed blinds which show that she is still asleep on her natal day.

And then comes a poor but attractive young man who, having nothing in his pockets wherewith to purchase presents, has gotten up betimes and picked violets for his lady; which offering he leaves upon a table just outside the little summer house. Of course he writes a little note upon a piece of wood and leaves it with them.

He has hardly gone when a poetic youth, a very poetic fellow, appears. He is evidently fond of himself as well as of the girl, for he brings her a portrait, probably painted by his own hand, and verses, to his mistress's eyebrows probably. He looks scornfully at the violets and puts his portrait in front of them on the table with his scroll of verses by it. Then, deciding to watch the reception of his gift, he hides beside the porch.

She receives many other gifts from young men in various walks of life; but all are rejected with the exception of the bouquet of violets. The rejection of the presents are witnessed by the suitors with anger and disappointment, for each one thought that his would be the favored gift. Then, the poor young man comes back in time to see the reception of his gift, and, as he and she come together in love's embrace, the fat boy slips from his perch and dangles helplessly from the summer house, while a little girl of six holds up her apron to catch him should he fall.

THE SHIP'S HUSBAND.—Mrs. Knox loves her husband, James Knox, and Clara Jones dearly loves her husband, Henry Jones, and it might be well to add that both husbands loved their dear little wives. But the "Charmer"—ah! there's where the trouble lies! Who is the "Charmer"? Mrs. Knox discovers a strange hair upon Mr. Knox's coat, where it had conveniently been placed by a practical joker, also a telegram to the effect that her husband is to sail with the "Charmer" at ten, and that he need not meet her husband, Jones. The green-eyed monster at once proceeds to grow larger and larger, and she rushes down to the boat, but it is far out to sea. She immediately proceeds to inform Mr. Jones that his wife has eloped with her husband.

This sets Jones in a whirl and he at once hires a tug, and with Mrs. Knox sails away to capture the villain Knox and his supposed unfaithful wife, Mrs. Jones. But ere this has all transpired, Mrs. Jones, who has all the time been safely on shore, discovers her husband, Jones, running away on a tug with Mrs. Knox. She at once sends Mr. Knox a wireless to the effect that Mr. Jones has run away with his wife., Mrs. Knox, and mistakes pile upon mistakes until the four curious people arrive at the ship's husband's office, where the mystery is all cleared up. "The Charmer" is the name of the boat that Knox sailed away on, and the "husband" is none other than Mr. Jones, himself.

KALEM COMPANY.

JIM BRIDGER'S INDIAN BRIDE.—The story embodies a very pretty romance which follows the rescue of an Indian girl by Jim Bridgers who falls by accident in one of his bear pits. Jim was taking the girl back to her father's tepee and her brother, suspecting foul play, set upon Jim, who was obliged to kill the Indian in self-defense. The girl's father thereupon set out after Jim's scalp and would have got it but for the fortunate arrival of a detachment of United States Cavalry. The story comes to a pretty ending of a wedding in which an army chaplain officiates and the parts of the bridesmaid and best man are taken by a couple of stalwart cavalry troopers.

THE WAY OF LIFE.—John Mason and George Bent were chums in a music conservatory. After they graduated they met and fell in love with the same girl. Mason, however, proved successful and won her for his wife. As time went on Mason's wife proved a shrew and the two gradually became estranged. In the meantime Mason found himself falling in love with one of his pupils. Recognizing his danger he sent the scholar to another teacher, his old friend George Bent. Later on returning to his home one night he found his wife had decamped with another man. In the course of events Mason secured a divorce and went in search of his former pupil for whom he had a strong attachment which apparently would not down. Finally locating her he found that she was happily married to his old friend George Bent.

BOTH WERE STUNG—A pretty young girl pays a visit to her aunt, the latter having two sons who work their mother's farm. When they see their cousin the result is magical: they both fall head-over-heels in love. The next morning their toilet is most carefully made, each producing some article which scores over the other. While stacking hay during the afternoon, one of them is suddenly taken ill, and betakes himself to the house. The plot not being very deep is understood by his brother, who, five minutes later also appears, having apparently run the haying fork through his leg. Their intentions, however, are rudely frustrated, for the two ladies make the invalids comfortable, and go off to finish the haying. The last scene shows how the waiting game pays, for the girl is seen in a quiet spot embracing a third man, the two brothers being hidden onlookers.

Picturesque Majorca.—In the Mediterranean. A combination of scenic and educational views produced in the usual perfect manner of this concern.

This film presents all the native activities in a perfectly clear manner and shown under such ideal conditions as to make exceptionally pleasing pictures of events which partake of an industrial tone.

Tours of this kind seem to be making decided gains in popular favor.

A TRIP TO THE BLUE GROTTO, CAPRI, ITALY.—A well finished and comprehensive trip to the famous grotto.

The passengers embark in a small steamer at Naples, of which place an excellent view is shown from the stern of the vessel.

As Sorrento is passed we obtain some particularly impressive pictures of that well-known city, shortly after we come into sight of Capri.

Here we disembark, taking our places in rowboats and begin an inspection of this strange cave, to enter which we are forced to lie down in our boat. On the return to Capri we close our little trip with a beautiful Mediterranean sunset.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

(G. Kleine.)

THE RIVAL BARONS.—The Duke of Hartings and John of Northbourne are rivals for the hand of Alice, the daughter of a neighboring baron. The Duke, rejected, waylays the lovers and imprisons them. On a threat that her lover will be killed, Alice consents to marry the Duke. John makes his escape, and flies for sanctuary to a monastery where the Prior, invested with all the authority of his order, withstands the fugitive's pursuers. A message comes to the Prior from the Duke, asking that a monk may attend at the castle and perform the marriage ceremony. John, disguised as a monk, goes to the castle, first enlisting the aid of Alice's father, who follows him with a bodyguard. Instead of performing the ceremony, the monk throws off his disguise. The Duke, beset from within and without, is overpowered, and the lovers are triumphant.

AN ALPINE RETREAT.—Gersau, and the Lake of Url, Switzerland. Wooded heights rise from the water's edge; noble mansions nestle amid horticultural beauties on the banks and islands of the lake; mountains, now half enshrouded in soft morning mists, now bathed in brilliant mid-day sunlight, rise height above height in silent sublimity to the far distant horizon, and the whole forms a motion picture series of exceptional loveliness which will appeal to the stay-at-home and to the traveler alike.

THE STREET PREACHER.—Florence Nixon engaged herself to Henry Martin because she thought he would quickly win a church in the city. He was one of the most promising students of his class at the divinity school and it was only natural to suppose that he would soon find a wealthy congregation. But Henry was an earnest and sincere man. He saw that he was needed upon the street more than in the pulpit and it was a shock to Florence when he wrote that upon his graduation he would become a city missionary. Instead of the mistress of a fashionable parsonage she would be the wife of a street preacher. Her castles in the air quickly vanished and without compunction she wrote to break the engagement and determined to win her own way in the big town. Meantime Martin had become a city missionary and one of his talks so impressed Florence that she urged Ransom to marry her. This he refused to do, but the preacher touched his heart and he went back to Florence to tell her that he would right his wrong. He found her staring at a revolver. She had decided to make away with herself. Ransom took the weapon from her and sent the maid for the minister who so worked upon his feelings. It was Martin, married to Florence's chum and Florence had good reason for being glad that he chose the vocation of street preacher.

RIGHT IN FRONT OF FATHER.—Betty's father was a deacon in the church and so was Rob's. Betty's father objected to Rob and Rob's father objected to Betty because Betty's father objected to Rob. But Rob did not object to Betty, far from it. He wanted to marry her and he wanted to marry her quickly. He had a moustache and an undying affection and thought that a sufficient equipment for a bridegroom. Betty's father told Betty that if she married without his consent and in his presence he would disinherit her and to clinch things he wrote Rob's father to that effect. Robert was shown the letter and told that the statement went double for him. It looked pretty bad for the course of true love for a while, but not for nothing was Betty the daughter of her father. She found that the two old men had a conference with the pastor and she sent post haste for Rob to come over and bring a suit of his clothes with him. Rob wonderingly complied and was surprised to see Betty snip off her fine growth of hair and trim what was left boy fashion. Then she fixed the hair that it would look like a wig and called for Rob's moustache. In a suit of Rob's she made a personable boy and he was a fairly good looking girl. They sought the minister's house and asked him to marry them. There had to be witnesses so the minister calls in his deacons who regarded the ceremony with approval until it was found that the young folks had complied with the seemingly impossible for had they not been married right in front of father?

HIS SERGEANT'S STRIPES.—A young corporal in the United States Cavalry in the Black Hills is very much in love with a young ranchman's daughter who lives near the military barracks. He asks her to marry him and she promises to do so when he has won his third stripe, making him sergeant. It is not long before he receives an assignment from his superior officer to carry an important despatch to the commanding general at Fort Darrow. In the successful fulfillment of his mission he would be promoted to the office of sergeant, secure his third stripe and his girl.

He meets his sweetheart and tells her of his dangerous and important errand. In telling it he is overheard by one of the hostile Indians who notifies others of the tribe, and they watch his every move, follow him when he starts and pursue him when he tries to escape. The young fellow finds it impossible to get away from them and, as instructed in case of danger, he burns the despatch, faithful to the performance of his duty rather than the preservation of his life.

The girl, feeling sure that the young soldier would become a sergeant and her husband, patiently and anxiously awaits his return. She sews the third stripe on his coat sleeve, anticipating his promotion. Little knowing it would only bear witness to his honor while he lay silent in the grave.

He is killed by the red men who find his body but not the despatch—only the ashes of it. He has won his stripes and his girl, but has lost his life in his country's service.

PATHE FRERES.

A SHADOW OF THE PAST.—Jacques de Calones is in love with the beautiful Louise Swinton. He learns that he has a wealthy rival. To win her favor he steals a necklace and is arrested. The woman for whom he has sinned turns from him in disgust. Thirty years later we see the return of Jacques. Ragged, his hair cropped close, his face heavily lined, his slinking gait betraying the creature harassed by fate, he forces his way through the window into the room where his former love, now a faded, feeble woman, sits at her writing table. She sees the reflection of the man in a tiny mirror on her desk, and believes him to be an ordinary housebreaker. Jacques slowly approaches, and asks if she does not remember him. A slow recognition dawns in her eyes, and she is horrified. He bids her listen and see the wreck she has made of his life. Then in a sudden flow of vivid ruthless words, that sear her very soul, he paints the story of his ruined life. As he tells the story, he lives again through the horror of past years, and pacing the room in mental anguish, he cries curses upon his former temptress as, shuddering at the pictures he calls up before her, she sits huddled up in her chair moaning pitifully for mercy. But the end of the story is not yet, and Jacques relentlessly describes to her the degradation, the intolerable suffering of his life as a convict in the stone quarries, his aching limbs, the warden's armed pistol always ready to exact obedience, and the frenzied hopelessness of those long years. The recital comes to an end at last in a torrent of tumbling words, which die away as Louise, struggling under the weight of her emotion and remorse, starts from her chair with a quick choking cry, and as suddenly falls inert at the feet of the ex-convict. Slowly Jacques realizes the tragedy, and taking off his cap walks on his weary way.

LOVE LAUGHS AT LOCKSMITHS.—Charlie Smithers is anxious to get married to Sadie Fox, but her stern father, a well-to-do farmer, does not approve of her marrying a gay city fellow with more money than brains. An attempt to elope in an automobile is seen by the irate father, who follows in his rig and quickly overtakes the pair when the auto breaks down. He takes his daughter back with him after administering to Charlie a spanking such as probably reminded him of his more youthful days. Old man Fox after giving Sadie to understand that she is not to stir from her room, starts off to the village to do some marketing. Charlie, who has been watching his opportunity, sees him drive off, and not daring to go through the house, where the other members of the family might see him, obtains the assistance of the colored girl, who brings him a long ladder. With this he climbs up through the window to Sadie. They forget how time flies, and Charlie is still there when Fox returns. With the aid of Sadie and the maid he blacks his face and disguises himself as the colored maid. Then with Sadie he drives to the minister, swiftly pursued by the farmer and his help, who soon discover the trick. Charlie, however, drags the minister down his lawn to a boat on the lake, and in mid-water the two lovers are married, while the irate father stands on the bank fuming with anger. Thus are the words of the old proverb, "Love laughs at locksmiths," fulfilled.

RUSSIAN WOLF HUNT.—The hunting party is divided into two contingents, one of which pursues the wolves on horseback with a set of dogs, while the individual members of the second party remain on the outskirts of the wood with the attacking dogs held in leash. These dogs, of the greyhound type, are of a mixed English and Russian breed, and as the wolves are driven out of the wood, they dash forward to attack them. Fearless of cruel fangs, they will spring at a wolf and bear him to the ground almost before their masters have time to reach the spot with their lassoes in their hands. Another second, however, and the beast will be captured; a wedge is then forced between its teeth, and in the evening, together with several other captives, it will be brought back, still living, amidst the joyous barking of the dogs, and the rattling of sleigh bells, and the shouts of the hunters.

PHAEDRA.—Hippolytus, the handsome son of Theseus, the great legendary hero of the Greeks, is beloved by all the women. His father's second wife, Phaedra, is also charmed by his magnificent looks. He, terrified, spurns her, and in his rage treats her roughly. Theseus, who has been at the wars for some years, returns a conqueror, and is met by his son and together they proceed in triumph to their home. Here Phaedra, thinking to be avenged on Hippolytus for his treatment of her, informs Theseus that in his absence Hippolytus had made love to her. Theseus, enraged, curses his son and banishes him from Athens. Hippolytus accordingly starts off in his chariot drawn by three fiery horses. His course is directed along the seashore, but Poseidon, the god of the Mediterranean, in accordance with the curse of Theseus devoting his son to destruction, causes a wave to dash up and frighten his horses, who bolt, with the result that the chariot is overturned and Hippolytus is killed. The crowd, who quickly assemble, place his corpse on a plank and carry it to his father. Phaedra, stricken with remorse on seeing his dead body, declares his innocence, and confessing to Theseus that her accusation was unjust, kills herself at the foot of the bier.

THE OTHER WAY.—Two old cronies are playing chess in the magnificent suburban home of one of them, when he receives a letter from his only son, Billy, announcing that he will be home again from college at nine-thirty. The other then shows a letter he has received earlier in the day from his only child, Lucy, stating that she will be back from Vassar college at ten o'clock. They pull out of their pockets the photos of their only children and simultaneously the thought strikes them both—Lucy and Billy must marry one another. They shake hands over it and say good-bye. Billy returns, and as his father greets him, the lad pulls out his handkerchief, and in so doing drops the photos of various actresses. His father tells him he has selected a wife for him, Billy refuses to be dictated to and leaves the house in a huff. Lucy's father on her return home, also finds that she has ideas on marriage, and when told that her father has selected a husband for her, she leaves her home and declares she will earn her own living. Answering an ad. in the local paper she obtains a situation as governess to a child of three years, the daughter of a justice of the peace. Billy also locates accidentally as chauffeur with the same family, and driving Lucy and the child to the park they fall in love. One day being caught embracing by the master they declare they wish to get married and he performs the ceremony for them. They then each telephone their respective fathers, who come in hot haste when they hear how they have been thwarted. Imagine their surprise on arrival—each old man finds his child married to the partner he had selected.

MR. FOUR FLUSH.—Mr. Four Flush relates to his fellow club members (on being questioned on his return as to where he has been) his wonderful experiences and adventures while traveling in foreign lands.

We find Mr. Four Flush enwrapped in effusive smiles and weighted under a heavy load of importance. Arriving at his accustomed haunt, the club, after an absence of six months, he is at once surrounded by a curious crowd all eager to learn of the wonderful doings of Mr. Flush.

He asks for a globe of the world that he may be more accurate and convincing in his argument. Upon his departure it is clearly visible upon the countenances of his hearers that they have not fallen victims to his hypnotic bunk and have ideas of their own not altogether in unison with the returned prodigal.

Just then some kind and indulgent scandalmonger who has discovered the truth, tells the club the real facts and reason for Flush's absence. The chesty rival of Munchausen is soon confronted with [illegible] and wilts before his accusers after being convicted [illegible] spirit of all. With the light everyday [illegible] on large and inviting terms. He [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] Never Again!

GRATITUDE.—In the [illegible] Nevada [illegible] was [illegible] Morgan and his wife according [illegible] to cultivate with their [illegible] [illegible] and [illegible] Disappointed [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the Union service of that war, goes South and is sent on a dangerous commission into the Confederate lines. Strange as it may seem, "Ham" Floyd captures him and takes charge of the prisoner, who is sentenced to be shot as a spy. Floyd searches the boy, finds a wallet in which he discovers Hank Garland's half of the nine of diamonds. The boy tells him it was given to him by his father, who told him the story of it and said the half card might be of service to him some day.

Floyd tells the boy that he was his father's companion in California and gave the piece of card to his father, who had saved him from death. In return he would release his old friend's boy and allow him to escape. The boy gets away; Floyd, in the act of freeing the boy, is found out and is shot for his deed, and sacrifices his life for the son of the man who saved it in far-off California.

JEAN GOES FISHING.—It is not strange that Jack Crane, a young widower, takes Jean, the dog, along with him and his little boy when they go fishing. Jack and his son start fishing; it is not long before the little fellow gets tired and passes his rod over to Jean, who takes it in his mouth and continues where his young master left off.

See who's here! Mrs. Gordon and her little daughter who are very much entertained by Jean. While they are looking at the dog, the little girl drops her doll into the water and it floats out with the tide. Jean jumps into the water, rescues the doll and returns it to its owner.

Mrs. Gorden and her daughter thank Mr. Crane, and it is easily seen there is a mutual admiration for each other.

Finding a shady nook in the woods, the lady and her little girl are comfortably seated, eating their lunch. Jack and his little boy begin to feel hungry and start for town to satisfy their appetites. They pass through the same path which Mrs. Gorden and her daughter have taken and suddenly come upon them. They ask Mr. Crane and son to join them. Jack and Jack, Jr., accept, soon make a happy picnic party and become good friends, and while the children run away to play Jack and Mrs. Gorden become quite confidential and sympathetic.

The children wander to the end of the pier, where they go to sail a little boat which Jack, Jr., has made, and while thus occupied little Miss Gorden falls into the water and is carried beyond her depth. Little Jack jumps to the rescue and cries for help. Mrs. Gorden and Jack Crane hear the cries and start with Jean toward the children's voices. Jean reaches the end of the pier, plunges in and soon brings the children within reach of their parents and they are lifted to safety by Mr. Crane. The little girl is pretty well exhausted; she is carried home, and it is some time before she is herself again.

Jack, Jr., sends a basket of flowers to his young friend, engaging his faithful dog Jean as the bearer. He walks triumphantly ahead and Mr. Jack Crane and young Jack follow him to Mrs. Gorden's home.

The next and last scene shows Jack Crane and Mrs. Gorden standing in the moonlight, their youngsters not far distant, looking out upon the ocean; in the foreground Jean and a large black Dane are lying contentedly together. The whole scene suggests a happy union and a happy ending, and each one of the principals has made a pretty catch for one day's fishing.

PAUL AND VIRGINIA.—Paul and Virginia are two young lovers who have grown up together from babyhood. Their widowed mothers live near each other in rude cottages, on an island in the Indies, on which there are few inhabitants. Here the children are reared, knowing no play-fellows but each other. When Virginia is sixteen years of age, her mother receives a letter from a wealthy aunt in Paris, who offers to make Virginia her heir and give her a good education, providing Virginia will, in the future, make her aunt's home her own.

Virginia's mother, having lost her own fortune through marrying against the will of her family, feels that she must not let her daughter suffer the poverty that she has been compelled to endure. She accordingly insists upon Virginia's acceptance of her wealthy relative's offer. Virginia thereupon sets sail for France, leaving Paul broken hearted at her departure.

Virginia tries to be a dutiful niece to her aunt, who is very old and sickly, although she longs to return to her humble home and Paul, whom she dearly loves. When, however, the aunt insists that she marry a rich nobleman, Virginia refuses; her aunt disowns the girl and sends her back to the island home.

Virginia's ship arrives at the Indies during a hurricane, and although only a cable's length from shore, it sinks before help can reach it, and Virginia is drowned. Paul witnesses her death from the shore, and almost loses his own life in a vain attempt to save her.

THE CITY OF HER DREAMS.—Ella Brown is the only child of a poor widower. Their home is in a small town in the Middle West, and Ella has never seen New York, although she has always wanted to go there. Her father, finding times hard, decides to take a chance in the gold fields of Alaska, and when the play opens, is about to start there. He leaves Ella in the care of an aunt, a sour old person who runs a boarding house, and who promptly makes a drudge out of the girl. As she has no other relatives, there is nothing for her to do except submit.

Sitting in her room one evening, tired after a day's hard work she looks at her two treasured magazines, one showing views of her pet city and the other giving the latest fashions. The girl is filled with a longing to travel and wear pretty clothes, and falls asleep.

In her dreams she is transported to New York, where she finds enough money to enable her to buy all the pretty things she admires. Ella greatly enjoys her visit, and is extremely unhappy when she wakes up. But she finds that her dream will become reality before long, for her father has returned from the gold fields with a fortune and a desire to fulfill all the wishes of his pretty daughter.

ECLAIR FILM COMPANY.

THE EXILED MOTHER.—Dr. Moreau admits to his home very frequently, a certain Mr. Bridaux, an inveterate gambler, who is pursued by his creditors, even in the house of his friends. While paying one of his frequent visits to his friend, Dr. Moreau, Bridaux is presented with a note from a creditor to whom he has lost 3,000 francs, stating that unless the debt is paid immediately, he will publish the fact that Bridaux has failed to make good his debt of honor.

Bridaux becomes greatly agitated, and begins to formulate a scheme to save himself from the impending dishonor. He leaves the house with the Doctor, but returns a short while later, intending to seize the first opportunity to steal into Madame's room and filch her jewels.

While on his base errand, the Doctor, who has forgotten his medicine case returns; there is no way to escape notice, and Bridaux determines upon a base method to avert suspicion. He enters Mrs. Moreau's room without attracting the notice of that lady, who is engaged in dressing, and just as the doctor makes his appearance, he takes the lady in his arms, which act, of course, enrages the doctor, and he, without allowing his wife opportunity for explanation, drives her from his home.

Wounded in spirit, the poor woman returns to her own family, but she cannot rest for the longing for her children, which takes possession of her; a faithful servant brings her news from day to day, and tells her how the poor little things pine and cry for their mother.

Some time later, the mother hears that her husband is looking for a governess for the children, and so, under disguise, she applies for the position and is accepted. The children soon recognize her, but for love of her they keep the secret from their father.

Meanwhile, Bridaux, who has been going from bad to worse, is wounded in a quarrel, and on his death-bed sends for his friend, the doctor, and confesses his ignominious deed, and vindicates the doctor's wife, entirely. The doctor returns home, bowed down with grief at the injustice he has committed, wishing that he but knew the whereabouts of his wife that he might send for her. The children notice his trouble, and when he explains, they lead him to the room of their governess; he at once recognizes his wife and heartbrokenly implores forgiveness; a happy reconciliation is brought about, the doctor receiving the most hearty forgiveness from his good wife.

CHAMPION.

LET US GIVE THANKS.—"Let us give thanks!" It requires all the moral strength he possesses, in face of the bitter Thanksgiving dinner, to say to his wife, the mother of his son, "let us give thanks!"

For, after waiting fully three-quarters past the dinner hour for their only son and heir, Andrew Morgan and his weeping wife are greeted with the Thanksgiving salutation from a son so disgustingly intoxicated that he can hardly stand. The outraged but self-contained father orders his degenerate off-spring from the house. Nor would he permit a parting embrace. And, when after the son has gone, this stern and broken-hearted father meekly bows his head and quotes "Let us give thanks!"

The young fellow manages, as most drunken fellows do, to get into hot water with every move, and Tom's expulsion from his father's house, directs him to that of his sweetheart.

His reception at the girl's hands sobers him completely for she orders him from her presence. With scalding tears she shames him and cancels her engagement with him, on this day that should have been one of thankfulness, but which proves to be of despair.

Finally, realizing that he must redeem himself, Tom goes West with a resolve to atone and if possible to regain the respect of his parents and the love of his sweetheart.

It is difficult to break off a strong habit, and on his first day West, poor Tom loses almost his money in a game with card sharks. He accepts his loss goodnaturedly, however, but mentally vows to never gamble again. That vow he positively keeps, for having located a claim, he strikes a rich vein of ore, selling it to a prospector for $10,000, he displays his roll to those same card sharks but refuses their invitations to play.

Having become a favorite with the miners and cowboys, they crowd about him eager to shake his hand and in the excitement his money is stolen. In the depths of despair he repairs to the canyon to brood over the inefficacy of following the straight path, and to the same canyon come the looters with the stolen wallet to make merry over their haul and to divvy.

Meanwhile, a lonely, loving girl in New York, has coaxed her father into bringing her West to seek the man she loves. They, too, on this eventful day coincidently go to the canyon for its scenic beauty, as they happen to be staying in the town. They meet the poor fellow, in his fit of dejection, and he explains his misfortunes.

The girl's father is inclined to doubt the tale when lo! at their very feet falls the lost wallet with the young man's name imprinted on it, and containing the money undisturbed. Its strange appearance is cleared by the presence of the crooks on the cliff above, who in their struggles for proper division of the money, have kicked it over, thus restoring it to its rightful owner.

One year later, again at the Thanksgiving table, the families of Tom and his wife are reunited and gathered around the board, and they fervently declare, "Let us give thanks!"

THEIR DAY OF THANKS.—A young civil engineer and his wife are having a hard struggle for existence in the city, when Thanksgiving Day comes around. Their memories naturally travel back to the "full and plenty" of their former country homes and they each wish they might provide an old time dinner for their mutual enjoyment.

Each of them sees a department store advertisement quoting a very low price per pound on turkeys and each decides to purchase one at whatever sacrifice.

The husband pawns his last article of value, a diamond ring and the wife takes her savings of months, that she had laid aside for a new gown, and each buys a turkey and returns home with it. Each discovers what the other has done and dearly touched by the other's sacrifice, they each decide to make way with their own turkey, in order to give the other all the glory for procuring the feast. The wife gives her turkey to a poor seamstress, while the husband presents his to a poor cobbler.

When the wife starts to prepare the meal, she discovers that both turkeys are gone and the unfortunate couple sit down to an exceedingly poor repast.

In the meantime, however, the husband has sent to his country home a Thanksgiving postal card, which being received by his old parents, they decide to send him a surprise in the shape of a real country Thanksgiving dinner. Loading up a basket they send the husband's brother into the city with it and he arrives just in time to make it a day of thanks, indeed, for the young couple.

THE COUNTRY BOARDER.—Amos Brown, a plain, honest farmer, meets with an accident while plowing. His daughter, Lucinda, has a devoted admirer, Henry Borden, the son of a neighbor, who happens by and seeing the old man's condition, volunteers to do his work until he recovers, thus gaining the old man's gratitude and establishing himself still further in Lucinda's good graces.

As ill luck would have it, however, Richard Longworth, a young city lawyer, suffering from "brain fag," sees a newspaper advertisement for boarders, inserted by a neighbor of the Browns and arrives on the scene in answer to it. The neighbor's house is filled by the time Longworth applies, so the farmer takes the latter over to the Browns, who decide to accommodate him.

Longworth, with his agreeable city manners becomes a favorite with the family at once and especially with Lucinda, who has never met anyone like him before. She being unusually pretty, and he, having no other girl in sight to think of, imagines himself deeply smitten by her charms and proceeds to flirt desperately with her. The old folks notice with pleasure the growing affection between the young lovers and treat with belittling scorn the aspirations of poor Henry, the former sweetheart.

Henry, however, does not give up all hope until he one day, discovers Longworth kissing Lucinda and then he staggers away almost heartbroken and returns to his work. Later, Longworth, desiring to remain friends with Henry, goes to him in the field and offers him a drink of whisky from a bottle which he carries. Henry, who has been trying to resign himself to the thought of his beloved Lucinda becoming the wife of another, thinking only of her happiness, is shocked at seeing her future husband indulging in, what appears to him, a deadly vice and shrinks away from Longworth in fear of Lucinda's fate.

But a day of reckoning arrives for Longworth. His city girl, his real fiancee, arrives on the scene with her brother in his automobile. Longworth is delighted to see them, but fails to introduce them to Lucinda and her parents, who, all three, are gathered expectantly about the new arrivals. The fiancee, Ethel Huntington, asks for a drink of water and Henry, goodnaturedly, goes for it, returning with an iron bucket and a tin cup, offering the latter to Ethel. Longworth immediately intervenes and laughing at Henry, bids him get a pitcher and a glass. This, taken in connection with Longworth's indifference towards her since the arrival of his friends opens Lucinda's eyes and going to him she says, "That tin cup was good enough for me, when you offered me a drink from it awhile ago," and, then taking from her tie the pin he had given her for a love token, she returns it to him, crying out "I could never marry you after that!" and running to Henry, places her arms about his neck.

Ethel, witnessing this scene and comprehending Longworth's perfidy, removes her engagement ring from her finger and returns to him, saying "All is over between us, also!" and taking her brother's arm, walks haughtily away.

As Longworth stands gazing wistfully after her, Amos Brown comes from the house, carrying Longworth's suit-case and placing it at the young man's feet, tells him to "Git." Longworth protests that he is wearing an old suit and is consequently not dressed for traveling, but Amos, informing him that his troubles are his own, turns on his heel and enters the house. And Richard Longworth sorrowfully takes up his luggage and fades from view.

THE DIAMOND SWWINDLER.—A gentleman calls one day on the rich and young Count X, and tells him on discretion that he is obliged to dispose of a most precious necklace on account of momentary difficulties caused by an unforeseen heavy loss of money. The necklace is very beautiful, and the count wants to buy it for his wife. The stranger advises the count to keep it until the following day and to inquire of a professional jeweler concerning its genuineness. The stranger takes his leave, and the count keeps the necklace, taking it at once to a jeweler, who pronounces it to be real without doubt, and most valuable. The stranger goes home, opens a safe, a door appears, and through this he goes to a cave, which has been made a workshop, and where several men are sitting making jewelry. The stranger takes out a necklace just like the one he gave the count, and the next day he goes to the house again, to inquire whether the count wants to keep it. But the count says that he does not want to pay so much as demanded, and the gentleman regrets very much, takes back the ornament and goes towards the door. He now quickly changes the two necklaces, and goes back once more, saying that he must dispose of the necklace and will take the amount offered by the count, as he is badly in want of money. In the evening the young countess wears her new beautiful necklace. It is very much admired, but a lady of her acquaintance who is a connoisseur on stones, examines it closely and declares her suspicion as to its genuineness. The countess is, of course, much perplexed, and they decide to take the necklace to the jeweler, who first examined it. But this jeweler declares it to be a different necklace and not real. They now go to Sherlock Holmes who can give only little hope, as he has no clue to the mystery. One day a distinguished looking gentleman calls on the lady who first suspected the falsification, asking her to buy some valuable jewels, on account of momentary difficulties. An appointment is made until the next day, and the lady at once informs Sherlock Holmes, who appears the next day and hides himself in the lady's room. At the moment when the swindler is going to change about the jewels, he is surprised and arrested. Sherlock Holmes, who is a master in disguising himself still more succeeds in capturing the whole gang of swindlers at work at the secret workshop. The happy young countess receives at last the beautiful necklace which was intended for her.

THE EDUCATION OF MARY JANE. Tom North is indulging in his favorite sport, that of hunting. Proceeding a few paces he discovers that one of his shots has gone stray, resulting in disaster, for before him is a beautiful young girl who has been the victim. He takes her to her home and procures for her all possible attention. Truly regretful for the accident and anxious to make amends, he visits her almost daily bringing flowers and delicacies and it ends very much in the usual way he falls deeply in love with this pure simple country girl and asks her to marry him. He is confident that he can soon teach her the little habits assumed and employed by those of his set, but, like many others of his ilk he is mistaken and after many annoyances he becomes discouraged and sitting down he writes his mother that he regrets he did not take her advice in not marrying this rural flower. Sorry for some mistake she has made, Mary tiptoes up to her husband to ask his forgiveness and glancing over his shoulder reads what he has written. Heartbroken she hastens to her father and tells him of the letter. The father tells the husband to begone, resolving at the same time that his daughter should receive an education that will make her her husband's equal in every respect. Mary is immediately sent to a seminary and shares a room with a young girl who proves to be none other than Tom's sister. Mary discloses her identity to the young girl and then and there they determine that before the term is over that Mary shall be transformed into a city-bred girl, and the transformation is so complete that upon the expiration of the college term, Mary visits the home of Tom's sister and is not recognized by her own husband who falls in love with her. Mary sees an opportunity to tantalize Tom and she does not hesitate to take advantage of it by flirting with another chap which makes Tom jealous. To test Tom's first love, Mary with the assistance of her sister-in-law, dons her discarded rural garb, the gingham cap and apron, and confronts Tom as the simple country maiden. He is surprised and astonished to see Mary and wonders how she came there. He hesitates but a second and then throws his arms about her. She, realizing his sincerity, removes the disguise and gives Tom the most agreeable surprise of his life.

THE RANCHMAN'S BRIDE.—His father had been far too lenient, especially with George, his younger brother; indeed, Ben suspected that it had been to pay his schooling that the old ranch had been mortgaged. But now all this would be radically changed; fortunately, Uncle Ben Leyland, for whom he had been named, had just died and left him, not only enough to buy back the ranch but gave him a comfortable bank account as well.

There would be no more idleness or reading of books on his place! A resolution which he speedily put into execution by taking the lamp from his brother's room that very night when he found George not only burning the oil, but unfitting himself for the next day's work.

The final clash came the next morning. As usual, his precious brother was late coming to work; this, too, must undergo a change! Here, however, George took a hand himself and after a violent quarrel, which might have resulted seriously for Ben had not their father interfered, he flatly informed his elder brother that he would be bullied no longer and that he would leave that very day for the East. And so, despite the entreaties of both father and mother, George departed.

It was shortly after this that Ben's business took him to the city, where Dora Ross, by playing upon his immense vanity, soon succeeded in having herself made Mrs. Ben Leyland. Nor did she stop there. First, as a bride, she needed jewels; their home newly furnished and her people supplied with various loans; after which, by using the same subtle flatteries that had worked so successfully in making her his wife, Ben unhesitatingly signed over the ranch to her. Then having accomplished her purpose, the adventuress proceeded to show her hand by heartlessly turning out Ben's father and mother. The woman wished to secretly dispose of the property and the old people were far too much in evidence.

Once out of the way, however, Dora was not long in selling it; then, leaving a curt note for her husband, stating that he would be troubled with her no more, she departed for the city, where she considered her talents would be better appreciated.

In the meanwhile, partly by luck and partly by steady application, George had prospered; so much so that although his letters had never been answered—Ben had managed that—the young man determined to return and visit his father and mother.

But as George arrived at the ranch and opened the sitting room door he started back in surprise. Overturned furniture and wearing apparel were strewn over the floor, while huddled in a heap at one side of the room, he found Ben, almost too intoxicated to explain.

A recent letter received from the old folks at Bill Burke's boarding house, where they had at last obtained work, and the crumpled note from Dora that lay near by, gave George a key to the situation.

Hurrying to the rig, he drove over to Burke's and brought his parents home stopping on the way only long enough to arrange buying back the ranch.

As they entered their dear old home, the trio were astonished at not finding Ben; his absence, however, was explained by a note—"When I've redeemed myself I'll come back."

BILL AS A LOVER.—Our little hero has fallen desperately in love with a pretty girl, whom he meets when she is with her aunt. In spite of the latter's rather forcible snubbing, Bill follows the ladies, until they enter a milliner's shop, where a huge hat is purchased by the girl and ordered to be sent home. As they leave the shop Bill watches them, when his attention is distracted by the sight of a girl leaving the shop carrying a huge hat-box. Bill quickly learns the destination of the box, and by means of bribes, persuades the girl to allow him to travel in the box. Now his troubles commence. The girl tries to take the box on a car, but a sudden lurch sends it spinning. Then in turn it falls off a carriage down a flight of steps into the river, until, wet through and weary, the girl brings the gigantic box to the house. Here Bill's charmer unties the cords, and is greatly astonished to see Bill himself issue from it, wet through, and one or two eels clinging affectionately to him. As he relates his experience the girl relents, and Bill is at length rewarded.

BLOPPS IN SEARCH OF THE BLACK HAND.—Blopps, a jolly old gentleman, is much perturbed upon reading in his paper that numerous crimes have been committed by the "Black Hand," a secret society whose members leave a sign of a hand when a crime is contemplated. He leaves for his office, and during his absence a coal-man, laden with sacks, arrives to deliver coal. As he passes into the house he leaves the imprint of a black hand on the door where he has been resting. He indulges in a mild flirtation with the cook and again makes a mark, this time on the tablecloth. Mr. Blopps returning is horror-struck to see the fatal hand, and at once rushes off to a celebrated detective. Here he is much astonished and duly impressed by the various wonderful contrivances, and accompanied by the chief and another detective, Blopps' house is visited. Here the room is carefully examined, and the detective disguises himself as a footman, and proceeds to make love to the cook. This is not at all to the liking of the coal-man, who has hidden himself in a large box, and he promptly smacks the bidding detective in the face. This is the last straw, and convinced that someone must be in the house, a thorough search is made, the mystery is solved and Blopps' peace of mind again returns.

YANKEE

LONE WOLF'S TRUST.—It happened that he was loved by a woman, no matter what his name was for his connection with the story is slight, the type that by some inexplicable law of nature always finds the complement of her own saintliness in an extreme of the opposite type.

When she disappears one day, he finds a note which tells him not to hope for her return but to care for their boy whom she leaves to comfort him.

Lone Wolf, an Indian, who was educated at the same college, asks him to come West and forget his books and worries. He accepts the invitation and takes the boy along.

One day while out walking with Lone Wolf, he fell from a high cliff into the gorge below. When the Indian found him he was breathing his last and only lived long enough to consign a packet of papers to Lone Wolf's care with instructions to turn them over to the boy at his twenty-fifth year. Then Lone Wolf becomes a father to the boy who grew into sturdy manhood and was sent East to college. Naturally he believed Lone Wolf his rightful parent.

Mabel Carew, daughter of Major Carew, in charge of a Western military post, met and loved at first sight the stalwart Indian student.

Deer Heart graduated and returned home. Visiting the Government post he met Mabel's father and pressed his suit. The major told him there was too great a gulf between them on account of race difference and orders him away. Deer Heart happened to be near when the auto, in which Mabel was waiting for her father, ran away and headed for the cliff. Riding alongside and springing from his galloping horse he snatched at the reversing lever just in time to bring the car to a stop on the very brink of the chasm.

The documents left with Lone Wolf on the death of his friend were being cared for by Major Carew. Deer Heart had now reached his twenty-fifth year and Lone Wolf called for the papers. Mabel had just returned after her exciting escape from death and the major was thanking her rescuer. When Lone Wolf told the assembled party that Deer Heart was not an Indian but a white man, and that nothing should stand between his union with Mabel, the major gladly gave his consent.

CAST THY BREAD UPON THE WATER.—The hero of the story, a slip of a boy, looks with longing eyes at the richly gowned woman as she selects a fat turkey at the butcher's and orders it sent to her home for a Thanksgiving feast, the following day. He realizes how poverty has descended on his widowed mother's home and how different will be their dinner. Surely there would be no harm in his following the butcher's boy and borrowing that turkey, especially as the Irish lady could easily afford to buy another. But Frank only reached a block away, after he had stolen the basket, which the cook had momentarily left on the step while she chatted with the ice man inside, when he ran into the arms of a policeman and was hustled off to appear before the juvenile court with the cook and the ice man as witnesses. Here, Frank broke down and told his story.

Kindhearted Margaret, the cook, was touched by his pitiful tale and she begged the judge to release Frank. Then she and the ice man drew upon their savings sufficiently to purchase a great lot of provisions, including a fat turkey, and they escorted the abashed Frank home to his mother. Later, the ice man called at Frank's home and took him on his wagon for a ride. Arriving at the office of the ice company it was found a boy was needed to run errands and Frank was given the place. By perseverance he worked up to a point where he was taken in as a member of the firm. Now mother and little sister are well provided for and live in a cosy little home of their own.

Meanwhile the ice man married the cook and a child came, a boy, to bless their union. A year of illness reduced the little family to a state of poverty, the ice man being unable to work any more and too proud to ask for aid from friends who would gladly lend a helping hand if they but knew it was needed.

Frank, one day, bethought himself of his old friend and called at their home, only to find a "To-let" sign in the window. It was the day before Thanksgiving and Frank had promised his mother to do the marketing on his way home. Stopping at the butcher's he made several purchases and stood talking to a passing friend while the butcher's clerk placed a basket, containing his turkey in Frank's auto. The ice man's boy happened to pass at this moment and thinking of the empty larder at home, noiselessly slipped to the rear of the car and made way with Frank's basket. After a lively chase, Frank captured the culprit and demanded to know why he had stolen his basket. The boy tearfully told his story while Frank's thoughts drifted back to a similar occurrence when he was on a similar mission. Leading the boy in his auto he speeded away to the market again where everything good to eat and look upon were purchased in plenty. Then, guided by the boy, to the hovel of the ice man, and the gladness that he brought to that little family proved the happiest moment of his life. No longer do Margaret and the ice man suffer for Frank has found them.

POWERS PICTURE PLAYS.

THE ORDEAL OF HELEN GRAY.—Helen Gray loves and is loved by Frank Griswold. Helen's brother Arthur is imprisoned for embezzling some money of his employer. Arthur escapes from prison, and, pursued by guards takes refuge in his own home. Frank sees Helen kissing her brother, and, believing that she is untrue to him, he goes away. Chance throws the girl's brother and her lover together in a Western mining town. A letter to Helen from her brother brings about a reunion of the lovers.

HOW WOMEN LOVE.—Annette La Croix loves Francois, who is carrying on a flirtation with Lizette. Francois and Jean, another lover of Lizette, have a quarrel. A trapper in the woods shoots Jean accidentally. Lumbermen come up, and Jean accuses Francois of having shot him. To escape lynching, Francois runs away. He meets Lizette, and the two are discovered together by Annette. Maddened by jealousy, she takes Francois' revolver, makes him a prisoner and leads him back to town. Francois is about to be sent to jail, when the trapper appears and confesses that he fired the shot. In a unique scene, with a touch of comedy, Annette wins her unworthy lover.

A WOMAN LAWYER.—May B. Goode, a woman lawyer, opens an office in a Western mining town. She, being a handsome woman, the miners find lots of business for her, and later make her their banker. In a novel comedy scene, the miners are seen going to a clandestine meeting with May, each believing that she is in love with him. The girl does not appear, and the "boys" adjourn to her home, where an empty safe and a note which reads "Boys, I hated to do you, but I need the money," explains everything to the woebegone crowd.

HER FATHER'S SIN.—Harold Crosby, a man about town, awakes one morning from a drunken stupor to find his little girl calling and tugging at his arm. Unable to arouse him, the child in alarm runs into the street. Gradually coming to his senses, Harold is vaguely alarmed and puzzled to find a revolver by his hand on the table. Looking across the room, he sees his wife, as he supposes, asleep on a couch. Going over to her, he endeavors to awaken her and discovers that she is dead. The horrible truth dawns upon him—he has killed her—probably in a drunken quarrel of which he has no recollection. Realizing his danger, he starts to flee, but is met by two officers whom Helen, his little girl, has brought back with her. Two years later we find Helen an inmate of an orphanage. One day Mrs. Magrue, wife of a wealthy banker, whose union has been childless, comes to the asylum with a view of adopting a child to take into her home. She finds Helen crying. The other children will not play with her. They have learned of her father's sin and will have nothing to do with the child of a man who murdered his own wife. Ignorant as to why the children have hurt the little girl's feelings, attracted by her beauty and charm Mrs. Magrue selects Helen. Six years later we find her happy with her friends and adopted parents when one fatal day, Mr. Magrue brings to his house a friend of his—Inspector of Police Berg. Inspector Berg immediately recognizes Helen as the child whom he took from the murdered woman's apartments so long ago. Surprised to find her as a member of the Magrue household, and attracted by her beauty, the Inspector feels that he is safe in taking an unfair advantage of his knowledge to insult Helen. She, however, resents his advances and smacks him in the face, and in a rage he retaliates by telling her foster parents of her parentage. They feel obliged to let her go, and Helen finds herself once more friendless and adrift "the sins of the father" visited upon her. She meets John Noble, pastor of the church she has occasionally attended, and upon his urgent request tells him her story. He immediately offers her a home with his sister and himself, and Helen, grateful and happy, feels that she is once again at home. Grace Noble, the pastor's sister, takes Nellie to the sewing society of the church, where she is introduced to the sisters. Going one day to the church where the sisters are preparing to decorate the pastor's study, they are seen by Inspector Berg, who still smarting under his repulse by Helen and desiring to get even, follows them into the pastor's study, where he denounces Helen, telling again the "sins of her father." His insulting manner is so personal that Pastor Noble knocks him down. Helen interferes, knowing that her beloved pastor will probably get into trouble on her account, admits the truth of Berg's story and leaves the church, never to return. John Noble will not have it so, however. He follows Helen and insists that she return to his home with him. Later they are visited by a delegation of the church "sisters" who demand that the pastor turn Helen out. He refuses and resigns his pastorate. Helen realizing that her presence is a source of trouble to her benefactor, determines to go without his knowledge. He detects her, however, as she is leaving, compels her to stay, declares his love for her, and finally Helen finds a safe and sure haven of refuge in his arms—"The world forgotten and by the world forgot."

That's When Life's One Grand Sweet Song.
Only One Daisy Left
Oh, That Boog-a-boo Man
Any Place Is Heaven When You are with the Girl You Love
When June rolls around with its roses, I'll roll around with a ring.
The longer we're together, the harder it is to part.
Maybe you're not the only one who loves me.
Sweet Red Roses.
Now She's Anybody's Girlie.
Love Dreams.
O-O-Ohio.
Oh, You Dream.
You Stole My Gal.
I'm Just Pinin' For You.
Beloved.
There's a Girl up in the Moon.

Cut Out ⅔ the Heat of the Arc

You're bound to get both light and heat from the arc of a moving picture machine. Necessarily one accompanies the other. But there's a great difference in the amount of heat given off in different methods of using an alternating current supply.

Using Alternating Current directly, you need a current of 60 amperes to obtain 4800 candle power.

By changing the supply for the arc, to Direct Current, 20 amperes gives 5000 c.p.

These figures are taken from a test in which the

G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier

was used to rectify the alternating current.

Especially designed for moving picture machines this device eliminates two-thirds of the heat of the arc. Think what this means:

One-third the discomfort to the operator
One-third the chance of cracking condensers
One-third the consumption of carbons

The rectifier is the most effective transforming device on the market. It operates with little loss of power and requires practically no attention.

It is vital to your interests to learn all about this device. Sign and mail the attached coupon. Don't lose this opportunity to improve your winter service. Write today.

One Thousand Feet of Film Worth Rough-housing For EXHIBITORS!!!

CUT OUT the EXCHANGE that cannot or will not supply you with NESTOR FILMS!

You owe it to your patrons and to youreselves to deal solely and wholly with GOOD, PROGRESSIVE, RELIABLE, SQUARE and LIVE EXCHANGES—all such buy NESTOR FILMS.

'Tis all very well and very commendable to "help thy neighbor" when he's down—BUT the Exchangeman, whose grasping, se'fish, dictatorial business methods, have caused his downfall, who persists in remaining down and who delights to wallow in filth, should not be permitted to fasten his dying grip on you and drag you down to his level—the gutter of failure.

SHUN any Exchange that offers excuses instead of NESTOR FILMS! Avoid it as you would a leper! Leave it to die alone and to bury itself into the hole its own hands have dug!

CUT OUT the Exchange that cannot or will not supply you with ONE NESTOR A WEEK!

"The Ranchman's Bride" is a woman of INFINITE CHARM. Unfortunately she happens to be a finished adventuress—as heartless as she is beautiful—and causes no end of trouble.

Her devilish schemes pan out for a while; but, as usual, the inevitable hour of reckoning comes and then—then there's "something doing." Come to think of it, there's "something doing" in every inch of this film; yes, there's "something doing" from start to finish—"something doing," done so remarkably well in this PICTURE of SUPERLATIVE BEAUTY that will DELIGHT tens of thousands.

ORDER NOW—GET—FEATURE.

Canal Dover, Ohio, U. S. A.

—If you are a Licensed Moving Picture Exhibitor, I want your name and address so I can send you a letter received from a licensed exhibitor who has recently turned Independent.

—It is a letter you ought to read and think about.

—Chances are this man's case is parallel with your very own. He was in trouble and found the way out. His letter will show you the way out of your present troubles or threatened ones.

—I find to my amazement that there are many licensed exhibitors who have not seen a reel of Independent film for months. Of all the careless ways of doing business, this is positively the worst. It may interest you to know that my success has been due to the fact that I watch my competitors' affairs as closely as I watch my own. Only a fool seeks to blind himself into thinking that no one else can possibly turn out as good stuff as he is turning out.

—I can take a licensed theater that is losing money and put it on its feet. I know the exhibitor's game as well as you do. I started as an exhibitor. All my sympathies are with exhibitors. I went through all the good and bad phases of the theater-owning business, just as you are going through them now. I am still an exhibitor.

—I own a string of moving picture theaters. Every one of them was at one time using licensed films. Every one of them is now using Independent films. And every one of them is making more money with Independent subjects than it ever did with licensed.

—I have spent fortune after fortune building up the Independent business and making it absolutely safe for you or any one else to quit paying ridiculous royalties and switch to the use of Independent pictures—— [illegible] not only from the standpoint of money-making, but from [illegible] legal and every other point.

—Naturally, then, I have [illegible] right to expect that when you turn Independent (as you will eventually), your first thought will be of The Laemmle Film [illegible]rvice. I want to be the one to whom you give your trial order for Independent goods. I want you to be dead sure that when you do try Independent films, you try them right! I dont want you to make the mistake of starting with some junk exchange which is not buying all the best Independent films.

—I want your confidence. I've earned it. I deserve it. If you're ever in doubt what to do about the numerous scraps that are always going on in the moving picture business——in both the licensed and the Independent camps——consult me. I'll give you the straight unvarnished truth, no matter whom it hits. In fact, I've built up my enormous business by telling the plain truth and sticking to quality. You may fire when ready.

Motion Photography and the Mirror Screen

The Two Greatest Inventions in the Amusement Producing World

Motion Photography's Pre-eminent State of Perfection
is Due to the Invention of the MIRROR SCREEN.

WHY THE MIRROR SCREEN HAS PRODUCED SUCH GREAT RESULTS

The projection of pictures on the Mirror Screen means that you are working in the science of light as glass. There is no substance used which is so important in the science of light as glass. Glass attracts light, reflects light, condenses, projects transmits, multiplies and magnifies light. Glass is transparent or translucent, according as it may be treated or used in practice. In fact, glass is the best agent to transmit light in the many ways known. Therefore, a Mirror Screen is the most perfect screen that can be made for motion pictures. It beautifies still life, increases the detail of the picture; in fact, it elaborates that which the camera has recorded when the film was first photographed. Always the best investment for any theatre. Get wise before your competitor does.

BIO Carbons Produce the Results on Actual Test

The following test by Frank J. Fuller, Sec'y. I. B. E. W, Local No. 1, St. Louis, shows what expert operators find in the BIO Carbon.

Size of Picture	22 x 24 feet	Lamp	Edison Imp.
Distance Projected	86 ft. 2 ins.	Average Time Per Reel	20 min.
Current	Alternating	Number of Reels per 6 in. BIO Carbon above and below	6
Arc Voltage	55	Number of Reels per 6 in. ——— Carbon	3
Amperes at Arc	60

Remarks: With BIO Carbons, light was improved, outlines and tracery were clearer and softer, and noise was about 50 per cent. less.

BIO Carbons burned perfectly even, while the other chipped, cracked and pencilled and required more frequent manipulation.

Tests were run side by side for three weeks on all degrees of association film, from clear to dense.

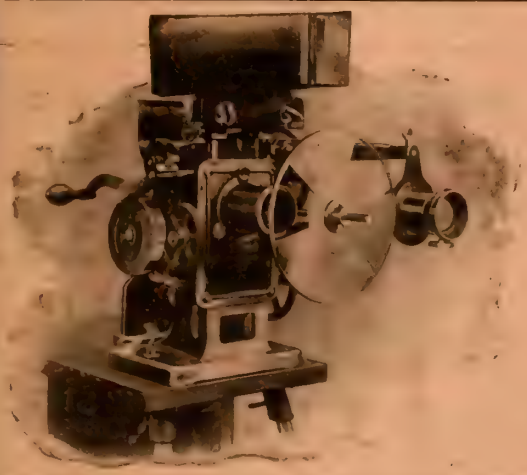
NEW YORK

Another Territory Conquered :: Europe Surrenders to

Power's Cameragraph No. 6



THE return of our Vice-President from Europe marks the introduction of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6 into the European market on an unprecedented scale.

Negotiations with European houses desiring the agency have been under way for nearly a year, but the physical impossibility of producing a sufficient number of machines to meet the home demand prevented the establishment of foreign agencies until this time.

Recent increases in manufacturing facilities have placed us in a position to accept foreign business, and our Vice-President accordingly visited Europe in October to conclude the long pending agency negotiations.

After careful consideration of the applications of a large number of houses for the "POWER'S" agency, the following agents were appointed:

AGENTS FOR GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND:
THE WALTURDAW CO. - - - London

AGENTS FOR CONTINENTAL EUROPE:
THE DEUTSCHE VITASCOPE CO., Berlin, Germany

These houses are leaders in their respective territories and their desire for the "POWER'S" agency is another strong testimony to the merits of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6, in which they have shown their confidence by placing initial orders for one hundred and fifty No. 6 Cameragraphs.

These are the largest European orders ever placed for American moving picture machines, and they mark the recognition abroad (as well as at home) of the superiority over all other machines of

ASK YOURSELF THIS QUESTION

If the Trust succeeded in gaining absolute dominancy, would it not extort prohibitive film rentals until it forced you to sell your theatre to it for practically nothing? Did you not get a taste of its arrogance and insolence before the Independents were strong enough to protect you? Why, then, do you contribute money every week for its support when you know it seeks to OWN the business—manufacturing, renting and exhibiting? Why do you assist it financially? The Revolutionary War was not won by men who helped the enemy, secretly praying for its defeat; and the men on the firing line would have died of broken hearts if their countrymen had not been loyal. Ask yourself what manufacturer has done ten times as much as any other towards strengthening your program of Independent films. Ask yourself what brand of films brings the most money to your box office. Then make up your mind to quit taking things easy and to get TWO IMP FILMS EVERY WEEK if you have to fight for them. If you want to know what exchanges are buying TWO IMPS A WEEK, ask US.

Here's a Fool Film!

We are going to release a film called "The Revolving Doors" on Monday, Nov. 28. Not a slapstick, but just plain screamer. When you see two frantic pairs of lovers chasing through the revolving doors, you'll yell. And if YOU yell, what will your audience do? Get busy with your exchange and write a letter every day till you get this good film.

Next, an Imp Drama!

Our release of Thursday, Dec. 1st, is entitled "A Child's Judgment." It is one of the strongest scenarios we've had for weeks and will give even the old-timers a thrill. But it won't do you any good if you don't get it. So begin ding-donging at your exchange till you get TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK. Will you forget, or will you do it now.

We're Making Friends

THEY'RE all saying nice things now about THE NEW ATLAS MELODRAMAS. Every day the mail brings us evidence of New Friends gained, and old friends won back. We're glad because we're learning what most of the trade want.

Now, we've made a DARING FILM, stronger than the usual melodrama; one, which at times will make your hair creep. Yet, the sentiment of the story, the wonderful moral it carries, makes the film a mighty Sermon, one you will talk about long after the title is forgotten.

SAVED BY A VISION

Released Wednesday, November 30th

A story of a sweat-shop beauty whose love was sought by a man above her station. She is shown living her life with this man to the bitter end, falling into the depths and becoming a social leper; but awakes to find it all a dream, then joyfully chooses her proper help mate.

A magnificent production showing the striking personality of Edmund Kean, the famous tragedian, who was not only a great actor, but an intensely human man, and the particular merit of this film is that it presents in a series of vivid pictures both the idolized actor and the popular man. The film is remarkable for its sustained interest and its gorgeous and brilliant scenes whilst the story is carried forward with rapidity. The acting is of the highest possible order being superbly executed by actors of the Royal Theater at Copenhagen.

NOTICE.

The new Western offices of the Moving Picture World, Rooms 307-309, Post building, 160 Washington street, Chicago, are now ready to receive World readers visiting Chicago. Mr. John M. Bradlet, Western representative of the World, will extend to every one a cordial welcome. They will find a complete file of manufacturers' catalogues and a bureau of information on films, theater construction, materials and supplies. They will also find desks and stationery for their correspondence, the services of a lady stenographer and a polite messenger boy to act as their guide or go their errands. We invite every exhibitor or person interested in motion pictures to make our Western office their headquarters when visiting Chicago.

"The Policy of This Paper."

"An Independent journal not allied with, or controlled by, any house or person connected with the profession. One that is free to speak the truth without fear or favor, treating all alike, giving due prominence to all that is new in the moving picture world."—Extract from the Moving Picture World, page 4, Volume I., No. 1, March 9, 1907.

That is the policy of this paper, a restatement of facts which we make for the information of J. S. McQuade, the Chicago representative of a publication which is not Independent, which is allied with and controlled by houses and persons connected with the profession, which is not free to speak the truth, which does not treat all alike, which does not give due prominence to all that is new in the moving picture world; in other words, that very artistically produced house organ known as "The Film Index."

It was inevitable that the recent definite statement of our policy on the front page of this paper should provoke reprisals from the house organ of the "licensed" interests, so ably edited by that able newspaper man, James L. Hoff. We told the reader why certain advertising had been withdrawn from our pages; we told him that this paper was not the mouthpiece of private or corporate interests; that it is and always was what we designated it to be in our very first number, namely "an independent journal not allied with or controlled by any house or person connected with the profession."

We are not writing this article in any recriminatory spirit, we are merely restating what we stated over three and a half years ago, namely that this is an independent journal, controlled only by its responsible conductors. The "Film Index," somewhat unwisely, we think, has broken its long silence and comes out clearly and distinctly as the mere mouthpiece of its half dozen supporters. It takes up the position of warning the public against financing any moving picture business not based upon the patents of Thomas A. Edison. It hints that the other businesses are at constant risk of confiscation. These businesses, to judge by the activities of their promoters, are not very much alarmed at Mr. Hoff's threat.

The pages of our esteemed contemporary were also, last week, adorned by a paraphrase of the fable of the ox and the frog, which makes amusing reading, but does not alter the fact that the "dominant interest" in the moving pictures owes its dominance to mere sufferance. Mr. Hoff knows as well as we do that those dominant interests are built upon sand and that, therefore, their dominance is likely to disappear at any moment. As a matter of fact no real dominance exists, unless it be dominance of confiscation. Will Mr. Hoff deny this?

The Chicago representative of the "licensed" house organ is in similar case with his respected chief. He has to curry favor with his two or three supporters in his city. He has to do what he is told; write what he is told; think what he is told, all of which explains his remarks in the issue of his house organ for November 19. He quoted some apparently contradictory opinions of ours about a Selig picture and asks what the disappearance of the Selig advertisement had to do with what was written, winding up with the remark that our Chicago correspondent was "not to be blamed for following the policy of his paper."

We are sorry to have to trouble the reader with this matter again and only do so for the purpose of putting Mr. McQuade and his chief right. The policy of this paper is stated in the quoted paragraph at the heading of this article. That policy is not dictated from Randolph street, Chicago, or Fifth avenue, New York City. It is decided upon in this office. It always has been, and always will be.

Further than this it is not necessary for us to trouble the reader. In the words of the poet:

> Distress not with thy troubles other souls,
> Since life hath thorns enough for all;
> With kind and tender heart and helpful hand,
> Gain strength by lifting those who fall.
> —Saadi.

Finance and the Film.

The moving picture is sharing the fate of everything that comes under the heading of popular novelty. It is attracting the hawklike gaze of the professional financier —the Wall street manipulator of other people's money. In this respect the moving picture follows a common lead which began, perhaps, with the railroad era. In more recent times, the bicycle, the automobile, roller skating and other popular crazes have given the promoter the opportunity of getting busy with his "get-rich-quick" schemes. It is unnecessary to mention mining speculations in this connection. From time immemorial, the "wealth of Ormuz and of Ind" has excited the cupidity of mankind, or that very large section of it which is in search of weath at a bound.

Our exchanges tell us that across the Atlantic the moving picture and the moving picture house are receiving the closest attention of the company promoting fraternity. Millions have been sunk in these enterprises, millions have been lost. Probably the aeroplane industry will pass through a similar experience, both here and abroad. Of a surety, whatever succeeds, the moving picture as a popular form of entertainment has the same fate in front of it.

There are some "get-rich-quick" schemes in the moving picture field that failed disastrously and the recollection of which must be fresh in the minds of our readers. The most recent of these is a talking picture proposition which was hawked about on the Wall street curb and is being hawked about in some parts of the country even now. The Film Import and Trading Company was a purely financial scheme without any solid basis of business operations. The International Projecting and Producing Company was another. These things are within recent memory, and we join with all well wishers of the moving picture business in deprecating the repetition of similar schemes.

But while we unhesitatingly condemn stock jobbing schemes of this nature with regard to the moving picture and other branches of the industry, we must be careful lest perfectly legitimate methods of doing business fall under the same condemnation. Men of the world know very well that the line between perfectly reputable finance and that which deserves condemnation or reprobation is a very narrow one indeed. Charles W. Morse, who is down in the Federal prison, at Atlanta, is suffering from the infraction of a legal technicality. There are numerous high financiers in the Wall street region who have been more careful than Mr. Morse, but who are nevertheless in such case that it is good to let the public be warned of them. Some of these individuals are possibly rife in the moving picture field. We say "possibly" advisedly. The methods of a high finance in the moving picture industry commenced about two years ago. They have continued and are being continued this moment, and it is perfectly proper, therefore, that the public should be warned of them. To claim that half a dozen makers of moving pictures have the monopoly of interest possessing the element of absolute security in investment, surely invites very rigid scrutiny indeed on the part of the public, and we hope they will secure it. Moreover the public will be well within their rights in investigating the patent claims upon which those securities rest. That which is permissible and non-permissible in financial operations is a moot point.

Ex nihil nihil fit: Out of nothing, nothing is made. Another way of putting it is that nothing can be accomplished in this world without money. The first step in any human enterprise is to get money. And so long as that money be obtained honestly and without reservation to the uses to which it is put, nobody has the right to condemn and nobody has a right to unfavorably criticise the motives of the money getters. For example: It is perfectly permissible for, let us say, A. J. Clapham, Lewis J. Rossett, John S. Young, A. S. Royal to form a small syndicate to put up a sum of money by way of preliminary expenses to form a larger company for the acquisition of film factories, film rental agencies, film patents, etc. There are plenty of these on the market. It is just as permissible for these gentlemen to do this thing as it was for other gentlemen to form the General Film Company and The Motion Picture Patents Company. For the life of us we cannot detect the smallest difference between the Royal-Young-Rossett-Clapham scheme and the other two companies which we have referred to. All of them are animated by perfectly legitimate motives, namely, money making out of the film business. The General Film Company is not a philanthropic enterprise; nor is the Motion Picture Patents Company; nor is the National Film Manufacturing and Leasing Company. We hold no brief for the National Film Manufacturing and Leasing Company. We have subjected its sponsors to very rigid questionings and cross-questionings. We have satisfied ourselves that it has a perfectly feasible right to commence and to conduct operations. It is no mere stock jobbing scheme, though the necessity of raising money necessarily enters into its operations. So far as we can discover it is a perfectly feasible scheme for making and selling moving pictures. There the matter stands. If, however, we discover that the National Company is not what it appears to be on the face of it we shall condemn it in no unmistakable terms. Meanwhile we echo the sentiment: "Let the public be warned of all schemes that are bareface swindles." We are not sure that the exaction of $2 a week from helpless moving picture exhibitors does not fall under this latter category.

"Puck" Runs Amuck.

"Puck" is a humorous publication, which is deservedly noted for the wit and pungency of its illustrations. It enjoys a wide reputation and undoubtedly influences a large clientele. Some of these humorous illustrated papers wield great power; occasionally of a national character. We may quote the London "Punch" whose cartoons are plentifully reproduced in this country. Then there are humorous illustrated publications in Paris, Berlin and elsewhere which carry great weight. In the American press, prominence is given to good cartoons which hit off, tersely and graphically, important social and other situations. The draughtsman, in fact, is almost as powerful, if not quite as powerful, as the writer.

It is, therefore, with all the more sorrow that we perceive a recent issue of "Puck" sullied with a regrettable attack upon the moving picture. This takes the form of a double-page cartoon, entitled: "Young America and the Moving Picture Show." If we are to believe "Puck," young America is going to the deuce by the picture route. A parson in the pulpit is shown descanting upon the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," and straightaway a number of children are seen making for a picture show, where burglary is being depicted on the screen. The accompanying legend is: "From the Sunday school to the moving picture show is but a step." Does "Puck" really think that nothing but burglary is shown on the moving picture screen or that burglary forms a part of every moving picture subject? If so, "Puck" is very unobserving, very stupid and very unfair.

There are five minor pictures in this cartoon. One of them shows a guide post, one finger of which points to evil influences, the other to good influences, with a boy contemplating the signs. One of these is the "Evil road of bad moving pictures." May we ask "Puck" if a bad moving picture, if such there be, is the only evil influence in the world? Another little picture shows a small boy about to spend his missionary money in a moving picture show. Missionary money, we may remark, is sometimes expended in the purchase of alcohol and other deleterious things. A positively offensive picture of the series shows "Heaven according to the moving picture man." Heaven, if we may judge it by this picture, is a lurid place, guarded by an absurd looking man with two large keys. We have never seen heaven thus represented on a moving picture screen, and we are sure "Puck" has not. Another picture shows Satan with his arm around a small boy's neck. A girl is passing. The inscription to this picture is "The devil's recruiting station." Really "Puck," its editors, its artists should be heartily ashamed of themselves. The final picture shows a small boy before a magistrate. "Where did you learn to break a safe?" the boy was asked. Boy: "At the moving picture show."

We think "Puck" should apologize to its readers for inflicting this nonsensical diatribe upon them. It is an insult to their intelligence. It is an insult to the picture manufacturers, to the exchanges, to the thousands of exhibitors in this country, to the millions of picture theatergoers. As we have said over and over again, bad and indifferent pictures may occasionally creep in a program, but that is the exception, rather than the rule. Why does not "Puck" satirize these? Why must this paper, "Puck," go out of its way to attack the harmless entertainment of the poor and the young? We ask "Puck" to make the amende in an early number.

Back of the page on which our contemporary prints this cartoon is a list of plays in New York. These include, "Alma, Where Do You Live?" "Alias Jimmy Valentine," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "The Gamblers," "Raffles," and other plays which incidentally deal with crime, sin and wrong. Why does not "Puck" satirize these? Young people go to the ordinary theater as well as to the moving picture show. Why does not "Puck" get out a cartoon entitled: "Young America and the Stage." Is it because "Puck" fears loss of advertising from the theater people? Let "Puck" answer this question.

Split Reels.

Some time ago the WORLD called attention to the fact that more comedies were needed in this business. This is not the only thing of which a larger quantity is necessary. More split reels are also required by exhibitors. Take, for instance, the moving picture theater with a seating capacity of approximately 500 people, running three or four reels of film. On a pleasant evening, or on a Saturday, Sunday or holiday, business is more than ordinarily brisk. In order to keep things moving smoothly and not to have the entrance and exits filled with waiting people, the show must be necessarily shortened. To take out a full reel is out of the question, as it will lower the whole quality of the show. But a 400 or 500-foot picture could be very nicely removed—if the manager is fortunate enough to have procured one. The lack of these subjects forces the writer to the surmise that they are rather more difficult to produce than the single picture of the usual 1,000-foot length.

The manufacturers also evidently know that these split reels are needed by exhibitors. This can easily be seen from their method of advertising split reels in this journal—"2 on 1" is always in black headlines and is calculated to be the first thing to catch the reader's eye. If they do know this, why do they not satisfy the demand? Are they indifferent to the needs of the exhibitors on whom they are dependent for the sale of their product, or is it that the exhibitors' needs and desires are something to which they place little thought? Of course it is easier to pad out a full "feature" reel with more or less useless work than it is the split reel, where action must be condensed, not drawn out. Let the writer assure the manufacturers, both licensed and Independent, that the split reels are nearly always chosen by moving picture theater managers in preference to the full reel with a single subject. We do not attempt to argue against the feature picture. Managers wish for them, and plenty of them, but the split reel should be seen much more frequently than it is at present. The managers' desire for them is, of course, based on the public's requirements and desires in this matter. If the reader should not already be aware of this scarcity of split reels he can very simply inform himself of the authenticity of the writer's statement that such is the case by looking up in the WORLD the week's lists of manufacturers' releases. Such a perusal will show that in many weeks absolutely no split reels are released, while in many other weeks only one or two are produced. Had it not been for Pathe Freres the list would have been even more barren that it now is.

THE MELIES COMPANY NOW IN TEXAS.

The Melies Stock Company of actors, directors and camera men are now located at the Star Film Ranch, San Antonio, Tex., where last year they produced pictures which helped very largely in winning the present popularity of the Star films. With the increased and carefully selected members of the Star Company we look forward to some remarkably fine and characteristic pictures of Western life in Texas, Mexico and along the Rio Grande. Mr. Melies has arranged with a number of cowboys to assist his regular cast who are all skilled expert horsemen and women as well as experienced actors of reputation in the "legitimate drama."

"Edison: His Life and Inventions." *

A Review by Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

"Edison: His Life and Inventions," by Frank Lewis Dyer, General Counsel for the Edison Laboratory and allied interests, and Thomas Commerford Martin, ex-president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. Two volumes, illustrated, price $4.00. (New York and London: Harper Brothers.)

Comparatively speaking, Mr. Edison, at the age of sixty-three, is still a young man and therefore, we hope, has many years of useful work in front of him. He will probably have time enough to regret that these two volumes, which are avowedly issued with his knowledge and consent, were not discreetly edited before Harper Brothers published them. For it seems to us almost incredible that a man of Mr. Edison's undoubted ability and genius should give his tacit consent to being held up to public ridicule in a biographical appreciation. Let us quote: Somebody brought Mr. Edison a gold medal awarded to him by a foreign society. Mr. Edison's reply to this honor was as follows: "Stripped pretty nearly down to the buff . . . he refused absolutely to be interrupted. He has never sought nor expected the medal, and if the delegate did not care to leave it, he could take it away." (Page 742, Vol. II.) On another occasion another visitor arrived at the laboratory with one of these "metallic awards" and asked Mr. Edison if he had any others. "Oh, yes," he said, "I have a couple of quarts more up at the house." (Page 742, Vol. II.) Elsewhere we are told: "He takes great delight in imitating the lingo of the New York street gamin. A dignified person named James may be greeted with, 'Hully Gee, Chimmy, when did youse blow in?'" (Page 780, Vol. II.) Again: "One of his favorite jokes is to enter the legal department with an air of great humility and apply for a job as an inventor." (Page 779, Vol. II.) He is said to "have an optic nerve about the thickness of a cord." (Page 763, Vol. II.) "He works 19½ hours a day." (Page 763, Vol. II.) "At eighty he expects to learn how to play bridge whist and talk foolishly to the ladies." Is it not a pity that some judicious editor was not at hand to strike this nonsense out of a book which deals with an important contemporary personality?

Mr. Edison has been written about a great deal in the newspapers and magazines, but probably his real life will not be written until after his earthly work is finished. Biography, like history, is beginning to be scientifically treated. At one time, history used to be written pretty well much in the haphazard way of this book. Nowadays the demand is for history based upon facts, ascertainable, as far as practicable, from original sources and documents. So it is with biography. People with any regard for their reputation in the eyes of posterity are chary of allowing their biographies to be published during their lives. They very properly elect to be judged by people other than their contemporaries, who possibly cannot be placed in possession of the whole truth, and nothing but the truth without wounding living susceptibilities. That is why such great men as Gladstone, Bismarck, Pasteur, Beaconsfield, Kelvin, barred the publication of their biographies until after their deaths. To come nearer home: we are only just beginning to get something like a real life of the late Mr. Cleveland; whilst of all the great mass that has been written about Lincoln, probably the facts of that great man's life are only to be found in some small volume not within general reach.

Still, it is fair to say to the general reader that these chatty volumes may make agreeable pabulum for a wet Sunday afternoon. To us the ground traversed by the authors is familiar from magazine articles. The story of Edison's boyhood; his telegraphic work; his first check for $40,000—have we not read all this before? The dollar mark, in fact, is painfully in evidence in these two volumes. Litigation is palpable on every page of them. In the appendix the list of patents granted to Mr. Edison takes up thirty-seven pages. Posterity must assign to him his real place as an inventor; contemporary judgment cannot deny him inordinate prolificality as a patentee. Here let us say that between an "inventor" and a "patentee" there is all the difference in the world.

Unquestionably Mr. Edison has done very valuable work in telegraphy, telephony and the phonograph. How far this work may be justly termed inventive is, we think, a matter of discussion if not of dispute. We must first of all decide what an invention or an inventor is. There is his work with the incandescent electric light. "Until October 21, 1879, there was nothing in existence resembling a modern incandescent lamp." (Page 685, Vol. II.) Mr. Edison's biographers claim the invention of a practical incandescent lamp as his. Oddly enough, in Great Britain, the name of Sir Joseph Wilson Swan is associated with the name of Mr. Edison in the work. If we are not mistaken, Sir Joseph Wilson Swan, with whom we are personally acquainted, claims or claimed the invention of the incandescent electric lamp. Anyhow, there are in Great Britain, at this present moment, The Edi-Swan and Edison & Swan Electric Lighting Companies, of vast operations, which point to the inference that Mr. Edison in this work was not alone. Sir Joseph Wilson Swan, we may say, is a very eminent man of science, who has done great things in electricity, chemistry and other branches of study. He is a Fellow of the Royal Society and has other distinctions.

We are far from desiring to minimize the value of anything that Mr. Edison has done, and in writing this, the first of two reviews of his book, we wish to be understood as merely applying the microscope of reasonable criticism to an obviously inefficient biography of a really remarkable man. Of course our chief interest in these volumes lies in what they have to say about Mr. Edison's association with moving picture work. In this connection we have to say that Mr. Dyer and Mr. Martin make claims on behalf of their protege which have to be taken cum grano salis.

Mr. Edison's work with the moving picture is dealt with in Chapter 21, Volume II. This chapter takes up a paltry twenty pages. It is illustrated by a picture of Mr. Edison and "a group of motion picture men caught by the motion picture camera in the enjoyment of a joke, December 18, 1909." Thomas Alva is laughing. So are Messrs. Dyer, Marvin, Blackton, Marion, Rock, Smith, Long and one or two other persons whom we cannot identify. The same jocular and irresponsible spirit seems to have animated the authors in their twenty pages of a thick book devoted to Mr. Edison's work in the moving picture. We shall discuss these twenty pages more fully next week. Meanwhile we will ask the reader to digest the claims made on behalf of Mr. Edison by Mr. Dyer, joint author of the book, which we published in the Moving Picture World of December 31, 1907.

The Pictural Drama As A Fine Art

by LOUIS REEVES HARRISON

IT IS YOUR TURN, MR. EXHIBITOR.

How would you enjoy going to a theater where there was an emotional drama being produced on the stage, while a clog dance was in progress directly in front of it? You might be able to disregard the clog dancers and concentrate your entire attention upon the drama, but you would be better satisfied to have these inharmonious performances separated. They are not in accord. You would think that the manager of that theater did not know his business, but how about your pianists and the pictures on the screen? Many of these piano players are indifferent to picture performances going on beneath the proscenium arch and jingle away with small regard for the people in the auditorium. The noise they make adds nothing to the pleasure of the spectators in the audience, it serves only as a distraction, and is therefore a source of irritation, a nuisance in many instances like an interruption from some outsider. The effect is sometimes that of playing rag time while a singer is rendering a pathetic ballad, a ridiculous mixture of discordant elements, not suited to the entertainment of the least intelligent members of the audience, and operating to drive steady patrons away.

In the large combination houses, where vaudeville and motion pictures alternate in the bill, it pays to have a competent pianist for the variety acts and a little higher salary will get one who can also improvise for the silent plays. One theater in New York has put intelligent pianists at work (Union Square), and has been compelled to raise the price of admission to accommodate its patrons. People go miles out of their way to get the proper combination. Music can be made a tremendously effective adjunct, giving motion picture patrons full enjoyment of that part of the entertainment, and good music during the time when the lights are low is a drawing card for all classes. The extra cost of superior piano playing is more than covered by the increase of steady patronage.

Among the low-priced picture halls, where it is necessary to keep down expenses, the worst kind of extravagance is that shown in employing musicians who can not respond to the varying demands of the photoplays. If the music is bad, there is no relief, no compensation of vaudeville entertainment, and this cuts the patronage at least 50 per cent. Sometimes the musicians could do better, and the management is at fault. Some piano players give no attention to what is being shown on the screen, strumming away while chatting with acquaintances in front, or trying to attract attention to themselves by playing rag time with variations while the lady in the drama is dying. Such a pianist should be made to understand that the audience is there to be entertained. Over and over again, while trying to get the full benefit of the pictures shown, we hear the pianist deliberately practicing a song accompaniment, as if we were giving time and money to hear playing far worse than that of the street organ on wheels. The orchestra does not stop to tune up while the opera is in progress, and humble patrons of the little opera deserve something better than such intrusions on their limited pleasure. Discordant piano performances are an intrusion. They are decidedly unwelcome, without warrant or justification, and a slight upon those who go to little places of amusement to enjoy themselves. The moment such a player shows complete indifference to the audience behind him, he assumes their ignorance and his own superiority, but he is only a spoil-sport for those who drop in to the place for an hour or two of rest and recreation. He does not know his business. No matter whether his salary is large or small, the pianist who adds to the value of the productions the audience is watching, is adding to his own value at the same time by increasing the box office receipts.

Any man who exhibits moving pictures as a part of his business of entertaining the public should give that part intelligent attention instead of regarding it as a makeshift. He should make a study of the details from the point of view of those in front, and the most neglected department is the one herein referred to, that of the music accompanying the pictures shown on the screen. He should keep an eye on the young lady pianist who imagines that she, not the pictures, is on exhibition. Her laudable ambition to secure a steady provider leads her to become so absorbed in the young man occupying a nearby seat, that she rarely attends to her business unless there is an act on the boards. And the drummer need not be overlooked; the festive sport who shakes the sand box the moment he sees water, be it rough or calm. Because of managerial inattention, the picture exhibit suffers, the audience suffers and the box office suffers in the long run. He should personally scrutinize the pictures and compare them with other showings to make sure that he is not getting a junk handout. With good pictures well projected on a suitable screen, he will begin to realize that there is something in the side show that draws the same people day after day, who would only go to a vaudeville performance once a week. We vary our ideas of what picture plays are best, but we are very well united on having the best, and all classes enjoy good music, whether the lights are turned up or down. Think it over.

Instead of standing around the entrances and counting the receipts, present and prospective, or wasting any time telling an appreciative listener—appreciative for a reason—how you expect to place a production on Broadway next year, go in and study your audience. Find out what they want and try to get it. You will be surprised to learn that the audience is just as quick to recognize a find as you are, they constitute the real finders, being less biased than you are. You have no special qualifications for knowing what the audience wants, no living being has. It is your business to please those who pay to be entertained. You are to blame if they are not. Don't talk about "conditions." You will learn whether people think too little or too much by keeping your eyes open, and by keeping apace with the times.

The Lucimer Film Company.

The Independent manufacturing movement is spreading all over the North American continent and is penetrating into the Southern half of it. A few days ago we had the pleasure of a visit from J. Allsup Blackledge, in whom we were glad to meet an English acquaintance of some dozen years standing. Mr. Blackledge has been working in the picture exhibiting and making business in the far West and came East particularly for the purpose of purchasing manufacturing supplies, and also for the purpose of apprising us what he and his company were doing in San Francisco and Mexico. Mr. Blackledge, we may say, is the president of the Lucimer Film Company of the former city, and of a similarly named concern operating in Mexico.

Mr. Blackledge, who has had some years' experience with the business, has ranged himself on the Independent side. Rather more than a year ago when his intention to make pictures became known, he was waited on by an emissary of the Patents Company, who told him that he could not be allowed to make pictures, because the picture making business of this country was in the hands of the licensed manufacturers. Mr. Blackledge's reply was more emphatic than polite. And the emissary departed to his employers with by no means an agreeable message. Suiting the action to the word, Mr. Blackledge has provided himself with non-infringing cameras and lest he should experience any difficulties in the making of negatives in San Francisco, has an alternative plant in Mexico City, where he can defy any number of licensed threats or intimidations.

It will be some weeks before the Lucimer releases find their way on the American market; but in the meanwhile the company in Mexico City is working on local subjects, and it is their intention to take full advantage of the magnificent scenic subjects afforded by Mexico. The Independent situation will therefore be strengthened by the inclusion of a number of original pictures—certainly original with regard to scenery, characters and stories. We are very pleased indeed to find the scenic sentiment gaining favor amongst the film makers, as there is a large call amongst exhibitors of the country for suitable and varied scenic subjects.

Mr. Blackledge, who is thoroughly au fait with the moving picture situation in the extreme West, apprises us of the fact that the moving picture exhibitors there are going Independent in large numbers. His company is well backed up financially, and it has command of the very highest class of technical and artistic talent—the stories of the films being so cast that they will stand the most rigid censorship tests.

The growth of new Independent manufacturers proceeds in a most agreeable manner. Only recently we chronicled the formation of the American Film Manufacturing Company of Chicago. Then, there is the Revier Motion Picture Company of Salt Lake City, Utah. Now, we have the Lucimer Company, operating in Mexico City and San Francisco.

Incidentally we learn from Mr. Blackledge that amongst the Latin countries of South America there is an almost illimitable demand for suitable moving pictures. The American made picture of the "usual thing" does not go in South America, the people of which require subjects of the Ambrosio-Itala kind. In other words, it is necessary to cater for the great number of Spanish, Portuguese and Italians, or people tracing their origin to those nationalities. It will be seen, therefore, that the moving picture has many worlds left for it to conquer. All that is needed for success, therefore, are men of intelligence and the ability of Mr. Blackledge to handle the situation.

MOVING PICTURES IN SIAM.

Our German contemporary, Der Kinematograph, gives quite an interesting account of the progress of moving pictures in the Far East and the possibilities for German manufacturers to get a new market. We take the liberty in reproducing the article in the belief that it might interest some of our American manufacturers.

"If anybody thinks that Siam—this independent Asian kingdom occupying the southern part of farther India, the land of the white elephant and religion of Buddah—is with regard to European amusement enterprise behind in culture, he will certainly, right from the very first day in Bangkok—beautiful capital of Siam—change his opinion.

As well as in other branches of European culture—science, trade, agriculture, industry—Siam is among the countries of Far East not perhaps the most developed, but it is remarkably so considering its size and also the fact that it was only a few decades ago that it first got in touch with Europe and also European ways of amusement. The moving pictures especially have made a great success in Siam and not only because of the European population, but due to the remarkable interest shown by the natives themselves.

Comparing this with Anglo-Indian conditions it is really surprising that, in spite of English efforts of cultivation for a century, the great majorty of Indians—Hindus and Moslems—still remain, with regard to European ideas, in a rather primeval position. The East Indians find a real diversion only in their native festivals which are absurd, senseless and savage and would neither enjoy nor understand the moving picture exhibition when a subject outside of their own narrow sphere of thoughts and interests was shown.

The cinematograph can almost be regarded as the measure of the education and the culture of the people. The East Indian to whom the cinematograph is of slight interest is, in spite of his celebrated relation to the Indo-Germanian race, nothing but a savage. The Siamese, on the other hand, who has quite an extraordinary interest for animated pictures, with a genuine European taste, is far more adaptable, educated and cultivated.

From this it might be concluded that the moving picture theater in Bangkok—in its exhibition—can compare with those of any European city, London or Berlin, Paris or Vienna. The four most prominent theaters in Bangkok are Ratana Cinematograph, Phathanakorn Cinematograph, Krung Thek Cinematograph and the Royal Japanese Cinematograph. All four rival in trying to change program as often as possible, on an average of two times a week, and are steadily buying films from Europe, making a specialty of pictures of current events. For instance, the pictures of the funeral obsequies of King Edward were shown in Bangkok a month later. The film in question was ordered by cable from London as soon as the news of the king's death reached Bangkok. The same promptness was exhibited in securing the film of the Messina disaster. The educational films of much older date are shown. The Phathanakorn Cinematograph had crowded houses of natives on scenes from the Russian-Japanese war. Also great interest was shown by the Siamese for pictures of Switzerland and the Alps—travel through foreign countries and scenic film in common.

I think (concludes the writer in Der Kinematograph) that this information will suffice to show the German manufacturers what kind of subjects might be desired by the local firms. An important condition is new and modern subjects and it would be a great mistake to imagine that any old junk would do for the Siamese."

We might suggest that American manufacturers desirous of exploiting the Siamese market might communicate with the American consul in Bangkok and get a list and the rating of the principal theaters of the city. Four of the largest are mentioned in the article above and the address is simply Bangkok, Siam. Correspondence, of course, in English.

G. P. VON HARLEMAN.

WURLITZER INSTRUMENT FOR PORTSMOUTH, O.

A Wurlitzer automatic orchestra recently purchased by Messrs. May & Laudermann, proprietors of the Elco moving picture theater, is being installed at the popular amusement place, corner Seventh and Chillicothe streets. It is a marvelous musical instrument and one of the wonders of the age, combining the piano, violins, flute, bass and snare drums and rendering classic music with the precision of humans. The automatic orchestra is one of the largest as well as one of the most expensive musical instruments ever brought to Portsmouth, showing that the Elco managers are willing to go the limit to furnish high-class amusement for their patrons.—Portsmouth (O.) Blade.

The old Fourteenth Street Theater, with its first run pictures and first rate vaudeville is a pleasant retreat at any time. Especially so if the genial manager, Bert Rosenquest beckons you out of the waiting line and ushers you to a seat. I went there one evening last week in a critical mood. I had been disappointed in, even distressed at the show in a former haunt, so I did not come in the best of humor, but the atmosphere at the "Old Fourteenth" was most sedative, yes, indeed, and the long and varied show left a very good impression.

There was one point especially in which to the writer's critical taste this house possessed an advantage; that is in the musical accompaniment to the pictures. It was pleasant not to be deafened by the military drum and crashing cymbals too freely used both in place and out of place in many houses; here music of singular appropriateness was a commendable feature. Although the vaudeville is not loved by many of us more interested in the value of "the pictures" that which we saw here was not "violent in the extreme" but yet "as usual," yes "as usual," there is always at least one act calculated to please a certain type probably, and it is found here in common with other vaudeville houses; presumably it's the "spice" which the writer cannot in his ignorance understand.

Of the pictures they were good and indifferent. "The Model's Redemption" is really a serious play, arousing deep sympathy for the poor artist who dies of starvation before he attains the success of wealth in his art. The model, who really sits for him in a spirit of fun (her usual employer being a rich artist) awakes to the seriousness of the situation when she discovers the true condition of the poor artist and—too late—denies herself to provide him with the necessaries of life. Her redemption lies in the fact that she becomes a nun, devoting her life to religion to atone for her frivolousness when she finds that the poor artist had copied her face in painting a Madonna. The work is of average quality and commands respect. "The Last Straw" is more violent and ends in a tragedy. A young man from the country goes to the city, falls in with counterfeiters, and although really innocent is so compromised that he cannot prove his innocence and is imprisoned. Escaping from jail he becomes an honored citizen while the real culprit, after "serving his time," becomes a "badger" to the constant annoyance of his victim, who ultimately kills him in self defense; allowing it to be supposed that he had killed him as a burglar. If there is a moral to this play, it is presumably to caution young men against the unseemly "lure of the city." At any rate, in kindness, we will interpret it as such. The acting is good and it is interesting to record that at the close of the play the two chief characters "appear before the curtain," in real life fashion, to receive the applause of the audience; doubtless this addition is in line with the suggestion in the World some time ago that this should be done upon worthy occasions.

"The Black Gondola" is entirely another type of picture, its best features are the richness of the Venetian settings and the river scenes which are presumably natural. It is not necessary here to attempt any detail of the plot, as that is usually given in another column; somewhat ambiguous, it unfortunately needs more descriptive leadings. A rich man, evidently without truth, is made suspicious of his wife; and, assuming the role of a gondolier, he takes his wife and the supposed lover in his boat, then throwing off his disguise, the outraged husband throws his supposed rival in the water—a most ambiguous tragedy.

While there is nothing immoral in this play, it is a question if the diabolical immoral suggestion is not often worse than many of the loose plays more easily criticized. It is possible to imply an evil greater than it is permissible to enact, therefore, the writer questions the propriety of throwing upon the screen an anonymous letter to the husband saying "Watch your wife." It certainly fills the mind of every reader in the audience with unclean suggestions and anticipation. That a tragedy results is not surprising; indeed, it would be a surprise if it were otherwise; and who can tell how many other tragedies may be caused by the sinister suggestion. Acting and scenes may be good, but as nothing is either better or stronger than its weakest part; the whole play is reduced to the level of that letter and the writer of the plot reveals great weakness in resorting to such means upon which to build up a theme unless it is the manifest object to produce an unclean tragedy which closes with unpleasant memories. One seeks to forget the Black Gondola.

A VITAGRAPH NIGHT WITH MAURICE COSTELLO AS THE GUEST AT THE FULTON AUDITORIUM, BROOKLYN.

At the Fulton Auditorium, Brooklyn, N. Y., last Tuesday evening, about 1,600 people attended the three performances and reception at the "Vitagraph Night" given to Maurice Costello. About three hundred persons were unable to gain admittance.

After he had been introduced by the Vitagraph Company's representative, Mr. Costello made a very interesting and witty address in which he thanked all for the cordial response to the announcement of his name and gave them an insight into some of the features of the art of motion picture acting, its difficulties and its inspiration. Mr. Cranides was congratulated on the beauty and comfort of his theater and the exceedingly refined audiences which patronize his place.

At the close of the entertainment Mr. Cranides surprised Mr. Costello with a very choice spread at the "Ormande" and incidentally presented him with a gold monogrammed scarf pin and a pair of cuff buttons of the same pattern. The gift was entirely unexpected by Mr. Costello and it was some time before he could express his appreciation and thanks. The Park Row Theater, New York, will have a "Vitagraph Night" with Mr. Costello as their guest on Friday, November 25.

THE OWL FILMS: ANOTHER NEW YORK INDEPENDENT PICTURE PLANT.

And Some Rumors.

Rumor has it that the studio erected on West Twenty-first street by the late Stanford White is shortly to be ready in its new capacity as a moving picture studio. There the much talked of Owl films will be made. The word "Owl" has been associated with the name of J. J. Murdock and others in, or formerly in, the business. We are now told that A. Kessell, of the Empire Film Exchange, is at the back of the venture, and that the Owl film is Mr. Kessell's own speculation.

Rumor has it that Mr. Carlton, of the Carlton Laboratories (and the Reliance film), is either no longer associated with that company, or is shortly to be separated from it.

Amongst other movements said to be imminent in the New York moving picture business is the leasing by the Defender Company of the old Cameraphone Building at Forty-third street and Eleventh avenue, New York City. The Defender Company will take a new title.

We also understand that the Dramagraph plant on the Palisades, N. J., is in the market and is likely to be taken up by new entrants into the moving picture making business.

Rumor also asserts that one or two manufacturers who are now marketing their pictures through the Sales Company are succumbing to the disease known as "cold feet," and are anxious to get out. Rumor is specific in mentioning individual names.

Unlike other rumors to which we recently referred in the pages of the Moving Picture World, we know that there is a substratum of fact to the rumors hereinabove quoted, all of which point to some very radical changes in the moving picture business of New York City.

From Louis J. Riner, Chicago, we have received a sample set of his patented rubber rollers for steadying the picture on the screen. We will place these in the hands of expert operators in different theaters and report later as to the improvement effected.

BAXTER MORTON RETURNS FROM EUROPE.

Baxter Morton, the vice-president of the Nicholas Power Company, has just returned from a six weeks' trip to Europe in the interests of the Cameragraph, visiting amongst other places, London, Paris and Berlin. Mr. Morton was successful in opening up the London agency for the Cameragraph, which is being shipped just now in considerable numbers to the English capital. When put to the practical test in London, the Cameragraph projected a perfectly steady picture which won general admiration wherever it was shown.

Berlin took very kindly to the machine. It was admitted there for its elegance, finish and neatness of construction. Mr. Morton's observation was that the English moving picture house is very substantial and beautifully built, with special regard to the longevity of the business. In the British mind the moving picture has come to stay indefinitely. In one house that Mr. Morton inspected, the charge of admission was as high as sixty cents. In Berlin, too, there are some very beautiful picture houses, furnished with large orchestras. There the prices of admission run from twenty cents to seventy-five cents. The picture, however, is not so well shown in Germany, nor are the machines so well managed. No doubt with the introduction of the Cameragraph, this state of affairs will be altered.

In Paris, according to Mr. Morton, the number of moving picture theaters is proportionately small. The Parisians are very found of out-door life, and therefore there is not the scope for the erection of as many theaters, per thousand of the population, as, let us say, in New York City.

Incidentally we learn from Mr. Morton that the Cameragraph is very popular in Australia, whither large numbers of the machines have been shipped. The Nicholas Power Company is working to capacity, in fact it is behind with its orders. The projector, if we may so term it, is practically the key or, we might say, the pivot, of the moving picture business. In the exhibiting end of matters it is the first essential. Consequently when we find the Nicholas Power Company increasing its output of machines as rapidly as its facilities permit, we surely have a very clear indication of the spread and growth of the moving picture business, not merely in this country but abroad.

POEMS IN PICTURES.

"Auld Robin Grey," a film now on the licensed circuit, taken as an example, suggests great possibilities in the portrayal of many of the standard and well known poems; indeed this is a field which presents at once many interesting and inspiring subjects.

Few scenario writers can suggest better themes than those suggested by this type of picture. May we not reasonably expect "The Cotter's Saturday Night" from some capable firm, besides others from the Robert Burns' selection, rich both in thought and portrayal of character, giving a wide scope for acting of the best kind. The American poets, too, have given a rich store of subjects which the film manufacturer may do well to traverse, knowing full well that in these subjects there is always clean life and character, so welcome to the public mind, that the mere mentioning the names of many means instant approval. Moreover these subjects, besides gratifying the taste for the pleasure giving, both educate and edify; always producing a sense of satisfaction at the attendance upon such exhibitions. Give us more along these lines, please. In "Auld Robin Grey" a faithfulness to the original has been closely followed with commendable success, the pure sincerity of the lovers, followed by a righteous respect of the marriage vows, gives a dignity lacking in many of the more recent dramas. The benign character of Robin Grey is true to the Scotch sterling qualities of which he is a type.

Scene from "Auld Robin Grey."

The poetical explanation of the illustrations require great care at the hands of the operator, as being written in the Scottish dialect, they need to be read over twice before the reader can fully grasp either the truth or the beauty of the language and its interpretation in the picture. Operators as a rule are a little careless with the descriptive parts of pictures, especially the titles, which are often rushed through at a speed preventing intelligent reading. Therefore, Mr. Operator, while always careful in time allowed to read whatever descriptive portions are thrown upon the screen, please be sure when scientific explanations or dialect descriptions are used, to give the audience ample time for a clear comprehension of the same. With care in this way "Auld Robin Grey" is very acceptable and calls for more of its kind.

THE PICTURE ON ITS TRIAL, AGAIN.

The Atlanta "Constitution" recently requested members of the Georgia and Atlanta Federations of Women's Clubs to make an inspection of the moving pictures presented at the various theaters of that class in Atlanta, and to report their observations as to the character of the pictures shown, from the standpoint of educational and moral value, and whether they were such as would exercise unwholesome influence upon the minds of those witnessing them, particularly of children.

From an inspection made through a committee composed of three well-known Georgia ladies, and their report, the following facts are gathered:

1. The moving pictures shown in all but two of the Atlanta theaters, were pronounced educational, wholesome and unobjectionable.

2. In one theater a vulgar and objectionable film was shown.

3. In one other theater all the films shown were obscene or profane, and the committee recommends this particular theater should be ordered to desist from the presentation of such films, or peremptorily closed.

4. Better ventilation is needed in practically all the Atlanta moving picture theaters.

What the Committee Reports.

The report of this committee of well-known ladies, following their personal observations of Atlanta's moving picture shows, will be read with much interest:

"Since 'seeing is believing,' and belief means personal conviction, we realize that there is no more important means of molding heart and mind than to direct what people shall see. To direct; not to forbid, for it is useless and undesirable to attempt to circumscribe their seeing; the more we see, the better, unless we see hurtful, noxious things.

"No modern invention can do more to interest, instruct, inspire, in the fullest sense to educate, than the moving picture, if properly censored; but if carrying the wrong messages through that swift messenger to the eye, no other medium can do so much to sully and cheapen the standards of mind and soul.

"The investigation undertaken by the 'Constitution's' committee was not prosecuted in the spirit of unfriendly criticism, with a view to condemning the moving picture as an institution, but in the recognition of the moving picture as a valuable aid in a large, universal education for all the people.

Put Under Four Heads.

"Our aim was to see how nearly our local picture shows were carrying out the purpose of the use, and not the abuse, of the moving picture, and to suggest some methods by which they may be made no less popular, but even more useful.

"We divide our observations under four heads: 1. Educational. 2. Entertaining. 3. Amusing. 4. Objectionable.

Educational Pictures.

"1. Educational—Worthy to be named first under this head was the 'Resurrection of Lazarus,' at the Alamo, a wonderful and beautiful reproduction of many of the pictures from the Bible. The picture should stamp indelibly upon the memory of youth the truths taught them from infancy.

"Following this, came scenes from 'Thibet,' largely dealing with the religious ceremonies of the temple and priesthood. As a spectacle, from start to finish, it was wonderful. This whole production would be valuable before secular or Sabbath schools.

"The film at the Elite which showed 'Moses leading the children of Israel forth from Egypt,' was not only beautiful, but would do more to print upon the mind of youth the drama of the plagues which brought about the proud Pharaoh's command: 'Let them go!' than years of verbal description could do.

An Historical Story.

"The Vaudette gave a beautiful and helpful production in 'The Clemency of Abraham Lincoln.' Though a genuine tragedy this scene has many points of value, and will appeal to either Southern or Northern audiences, because of its broadly human message.

Entertaining Pictures.

"2. Entertaining films, such as 'The Fairies of Hallowe'en,' at the Majestic, which, with its play of fancy and dainty grace, was a heart's delight, not only to children, but to those of us who are just children older grown, were next considered.

"Of somewhat the same character was 'Lassie's Birthday,' at the Alcazar. An old fashioned love story, with a number of amusing features where Lassie's lovers make offerings in quest of her favor, and she chooses among them in the good old way.

"'The Woodman and the Ranchman,' at the Savoy, delighted the audience because to the due modicum of love was added a sufficiency of hate to supply at least the 'thunder' if not the 'blood' of the melodrama.

Amusing Films.

"All of these were perfectly harmless, and the same can be said of the third class of amusing films, such as a 'Life-Saving Comedy,' at the Alcazar, which was a decent roaring farce, and 'A Bargain in Hats,' at the Elite, which, though it suggested a world in which at least suspicions of universal probity existed, did so very slightly and without offense.

Objectionable Pictures.

"4. Objectionable. The same cannot be said of the one extremely coarse film which we saw at a theater, the name of which we shall not give, in the hope that only by an accident could it have shown such a mass, not of horse-play alone (for all horse-play is not offensive), but of actual vulgarity.

"'A Sufferer from Insomnia' has in it nothing genuinely amusing, and the visitors were glad to escape into the fresh air without having been hurt or soiled by the crashing of old furniture, and the falling of ashes, soiled clothes and more objectionable things upon some very unpleasant looking negroes.

One Should Be Closed.

"There was only one show which we were told did not court the presence of ladies. This was visited, however, and, from start to finish it is objectionably obscene and profane, and should be abolished or made to mend its ways.

"The crowds here were greater than at any other show.

As to Ventilation.

"In the matter of ventilation the whole system should be amended.

"Many of the so-called ventilators are just holes cut into the next shut-up place, and not nearer fresh air.

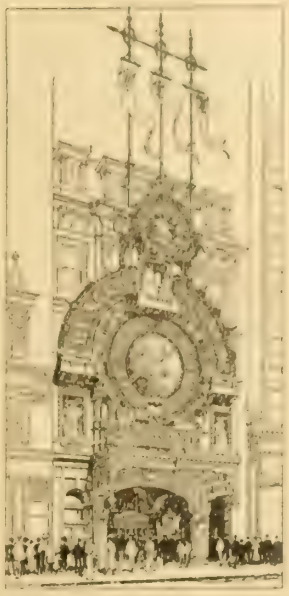
"In the main, the inspection showed the pictures presented in Atlanta, of a good class, and if the shows would advertise more fully their educational or esthetic specialties, they would be assured of a sufficient increase of patronage to justify their putting on special programs of the kind.

"Thus could this mighty influence for good or for evil be of more positive value, and become more profitable at one and the same time."

Bellefontaine, Ohio.—F. E. Rutter, manager of the Royal Theater, writes, under date of November 7, that he has "gone Independent," and states that he is "well pleased with the quality of Independent films." He is "making good against stiff opposition" and believes that the success of his house is chiefly due to fine projection and care exercised in showing their pictures and the excellence of the musical part of their program. A very neat four-page program was enclosed which reflects care in management and selection of subjects that we believe will invariably bring success. The World acknowledges kindly appreciation from Mr. Rutter of the value of its columns and especially as his success seems to be the result of what has been so persistently advocated by us, namely, the best projection of pictures combined with high-class music and no vaudeville.

THE "BEACON THEATER," BOSTON.

Written Especially for the "World" by Henry.



The Beacon Theater, 47-53 Tremont street, Boston, is one of the handsomest and best equipped moving picture theaters in this country. The contract for the building of this house was given out January 1, 1910, and the theater was formally opened to the public February 19, 1910. This date was three weeks ahead of scheduled time, and was only made possible by using three shifts of help every twenty-four hours, with 100 men to each of the three shifts. The Beacon's front, which is five stories high, is a thing of grace and beauty, and embodies some new ideas in the building of theaters. There is absolutely no wood to be found anywhere on this front; galvanized iron and metal being exclusively used. In the center of the front, about thirty feet from the sidewalk, is a monster revolving ball, which is a true representation of "The World in Motion," showing how the world revolves on its axis. On this ball are shown the countries, oceans, stars, etc., exactly as shown on maps. Four prominent lights placed in the center of this ball were made to mathematically show the North Pole. A beautiful marquise is a notable feature of the front, and is one of the most costly of its kind in the city. To top all this, a crowning glory, as it were, are three beautiful banners floating from the top of the building, bearing the inscription "Beacon Theater."

The house is equipped with a gentlemen's retiring-room, smoking-room and lavatories. A ladies' parlor completely furnished in mahogany, with a matron in attendance, is also a special feature of the theater. The house was designed by Mr. C. H. Blackall, one of Boston's ablest architects, the same man who designed most of Boston's high-priced "legitimate" theaters. Mr. Blackall thought so well of his efforts in designing the Beacon that he saw fit to send a hand-painted drawing of the Beacon's front to Chicago to the architects' convention held there last Summer. The ideas incorporated into the Beacon's front were originally seen in a theater located in Germany, which were enlarged and perfected. The interior of the house was decorated with a view to the artistic, rather than to gilt and a flashy appearance, and is simple, refined and plain. The interior is plainly painted in green, with electric lights scattered about the auditorium.

A 14-inch fireproof wall entirely separates the auditorium from all other parts of the building on all sides. The exits are very large, and as the house is not shut in at the rear, the exits in that direction are more than ordinarily large and safe. The ventilation is well taken care of by a 16-horse-power motor, driven by electricity, which constantly is driving impure air from the house. This motor forces out 3,000 feet of impure air from the auditorium every minute.

On the front are nearly 2,000 electric bulbs; these, in addition to three monster arc lights, render the front brilliantly illuminated.

The seating capacity of the Beacon is nearly 800, including the balcony. A breadth of 45 feet and a width of 110 feet gives an accurate idea of the physical proportions of the house.

As can be readily seen from the photograph above, the words "Beacon Theater," "World in Motion," "Admission 10 Cents," and the initials "B T" (in monogram) are electrical signs. In addition are two signs on the sides of the marquise, reading "Beacon Theater."

Clean, large, neat, well equipped and cool are the words that tell the story of the operating booth, in which are installed all the latest improvements, including the Power's Cameragraph No. 6 machines.

The Beacon runs six shows daily, opening at 9:30 a. m. and closing at 11 p. m. The ordinary performance consists of four first-run reels of licensed film from the General Film Company of Boston, and four acts of vaudeville, making a 2½-hour performance.

The house has on its payroll 26 employees, keeping a large staff in each separate department. The musical instruments used consist of a piano and drum, with all incidental traps.

Mr. Jacob Lowrie is the president and general manager for the company, and to him belongs the credit of instigating the undertaking. When interviewed for the World by its New England representative, Mr. Lowrie stated his house represents an outlay of an even $100,000. As assistant to him is Mr. Chas. E. Heath. The writer cannot close this article without praising Mr. Lowrie especially on one point. The great freedom from anything calculated to be in the least objectionable on its signs and paintings in the lobby should be a source of pride to anyone interested in this industry. Never since the opening day of the Beacon has the writer ever seen any painting or poster that depicted any scene of violence or crime. Mr. Lowrie is always present on Tuesdays and Fridays at the General Film Company in order to personally pick his films—and no film with the least suggestion of anything not absolutely clean and moral can ever pass his personal censorship. On the stage a like vigilance is carried out, and nothing objectionable is ever seen. Mr. Lowrie is helping along the cause by these methods, and, when interviewed, assured the World's New England representative that he intended to keep these ideas up as long as he was interested in this industry.

VERMONT—AND THE MOVING PICTURE.

A Review of Conditions, Past and Present, in This Old Green Mountain State. With a Few Suggestions.

By C. W. Lawford.

In the extreme northern part of this great and glorious Union, and incidentally touching the Canadian line, lies one of Nature's most beautiful scenic accomplishments, the birthplace of the Green Mountain Boys, of historical fame, and of many other important incidents pertaining to, and culminating in, our freedom and liberty in 1812. I allude to Vermont, a State which, at one time, yes, and is to a certain extent now, noted far and wide for its agricultural and dairy products, maple sugar, high-bred live stock and its particularly fine quality of marble.

One would suppose, and quite naturally, too, that a territory of such valuable resources, having an area of approximately one hundred and sixty miles in length by sixty miles in width, bounded on the south by that great navigable and superiorically scenic body of fresh water, Lake Champlain, and traversed by several railroads, three of which are trunk lines, touching the State's most vital spots, indeed, one would surely suppose that such a State, or territory, would occupy a high position in the march of enterprise and progress, and of being in a position to boast of its share of the country's prosperity. The latter it does possess in a mild degree, and among certain of the natives, who by the way hold it in their grasp for fear they may need it in the next world, capital in Vermont is like some people's blood, considerably sluggish with very poor circulation, but of the two former, progress and enterprise, it is decidedly and shamefully lacking, and considering its visible resources, hidden mines of commercial product and activity, and its industrial, recreation and amusement opportunities, the State of Vermont has improved very little within the last fifty years.

True, this is an undeveloped territory, and don't imagine for one moment, as a great many people outside the State do, that these northern towns and cities are nothing more than a cross roads, a town pump, and a village store, for, if you do, a visit to Rutland, Burlington, St. Albans, Montpelier, Barre and other cities in the State will awaken you with a terrible start. These cities are fairly progressive, yet slow in enterprise and "Git-up-and-git" action, and this, together with the lack of proper feeding by the smaller surrounding towns, and the abandonment of the farms by the younger blood, are the chief causes, supported by bureau statistics, for the revelations of the recent census, viz., a slight increase in the larger cities BUT—an ALARMING decrease in the smaller towns, which in rural countries go far towards the sustainence of their cities. The entire State of Vermont shows a gain of only 12,315, or 3.3 per cent. over the census of 1900, and a gain of only 40,855 in the past 50 years, or on an average of 817 increased population per year of the entire State since 1860. An almost unbelievable array of statistical figures, isn't it? Nevertheless true, painfully true.

Now, you may ask yourself, without stopping to think, what has all this got to do with the amusement, or show business? and with the moving picture end in particular; and if you are one of the many raw recruits, or NEAR SHOWMEN, in the picture game to-day, you may not see the connection, and the point, even if you WERE to stop and think, still it has everything in the world to do with amusement enterprises, and I'll show you WHY it relates to PICTURES IN PARTICULAR. Study it well, Mr. Proprietor, and Mr. Manager, in fact, it will offer a few suggestions to you, Mr. Manufacturer, who I know is breaking his back to please the fickle and spasmodic public; it has cost many a manager thousands of dollars to learn, and may save you, Mr. Proprietor and Manager, many a sleepless night of uncertainty.

Capital, the world over, seeks investment where it will have the widest scope, the fairest legislation, and in all where it will realize the largest legitimate returns on its principle. This is human nature and, of course, logical in any business, and comprises many factors culminating in a final decision.

The tented showman picks out several towns for his route according to their population, drawing population and shortest possible jumps. But is that ALL he considers? No, indeed; far from it. He also studies the market reports, the crop reports, the recent, and even past, legislative activities, political disturbances relative to his section, the city ordinances, the labor situation, both national and local, and the general condition of business in the territory he is going to pass through and play. He also considers the surrounding towns, and their power as a drawing population, the pay days, and even the last tariff enactments.

Now, this tented showman is in a given city or town for only one day, and only from three days to one week in the particularly big cities, and if these elements and conditions interest HIM, they certainly ought to interest YOU, who are obliged to permanently locate in these various towns or cities and brave the ever changing conditions, local panics, dull seasons, over production (causing mills to shut down), labor agitations, such as strikes, etc., power facilities and rates, and many other things too numerous to mention. The tented or dramatic showman has the magnetic advantages of these announcements "Here for one day only," "positively our only appearance in this State," etc. YOU can't pull these on the dear public and get away with it, neither can you run excursions every day in the week, year in and year out, or even for one day. You have the same thing every show, every day, every week, moving pictures, and moving pictures and vaudeville. You can't figure on the same patrons coming EVERY night in the week, or even EVERY OTHER night in the week, and even supposing they did come that often; they would soon get tired of it and gradually simmer down to two visits, and possibly three, a week, and with cities or towns relying mostly on their standing population you have certainly got to handle your show and your patrons with kid gloves to keep them from saying, "Oh, I am tired of this, or that," or "this or that is becoming a chestnut." Of course, in the big cities this contention can be overcome, owing to the immense floating population, or transients.

Then again, you can't build a theater, or remodel an old building into a modern play house or motion picture theater and then sit down and wait for industries to come along or communities to build up because that would eat up too many of your cold, hard, iron dollars, and the outcome would look to you like a picture on a sixty-foot throw through a thirty-foot lens, very blurred.

I do not discourage amusement capital and its investment in Vermont, or in any other State; rather I encourage it, and most heartily, too, for this is, as I have said before, an undeveloped territory, like some parts of Maine, Michigan and various Western and Southern States, and has great future possibilities in the recreation and amusement fields which, if the past fifty years is to be any criterion, will not be realized during your time or mine.

My underlying and only aim in this, and the following article is to caution and enlighten ignorant capital, rash investors and short-sighted motion picture proprietors, and their managers, with no intention at radicalism or reproach, or to be more plain, KNOCKING. The truth at times hurts but seldom injures, and if you as a student of the theatrical profession and a present or coming factor in the motion picture field, will profit by such meat in these articles as best fits, or is likely to fit, your own case, I will consider my efforts partially repaid and my mission that of enlightenment, advancement and progress, at least of a fruit-bearing nature.

In a future issue of this paper I will endeavor to put forth in an article entitled, "Getting Together," a few practical suggestions and remedies appertaining to these still wide open and uncultivated fields—the rural districts—and the moving picture.

Introductory.

It is gratifying to see how the broadminded exhibitors, those who aim to show the pictures to the best advantage, are fast taking to the idea that good and appropriate music does not only enhance the beauty of the picture but gives it life. From every town we hear that such and such a theater has discharged the music killer, the man or woman at a low salary who believed that any old ragtime music was good enough for motion pictures, to engage more experienced musicians. It is surprising to note how many theaters are improving the sound effects while many of them are adding a violinist; in fact, many other instrument players. The demand for good music is such that it is now as much of a rivalry between exhibitors to brag of their good orchestra as it is of bragging of the quality of their pictures. In other words, the managers are now taking as much interest in the music as in the projection of the pictures, and the great demand for extra musical accessories, like the Deagan electric bells, xylophones, chimes, automatic orchestras, pipe-organs, etc., shows that, in the very near future, moving picture theaters will be real concert halls and that the public will go to the shows not only for the sake of seeing pictures but to hear good music.

A full orchestra costs less than two cheap vaudeville acts and is more profitable to the exhibitor. Good music captivates and pleases, while cheap vaudeville acts give a very unfavorable reputation to a moving picture theater.

Realizing, therefore, the importance of the music, we make no apology for introducing this new department to World readers. We believe that Mr. Sinn will find a hearty response to his suggestions and invite every exhibitor and orchestra leader to write him for particular information or offer suggestions, addressing same to Music Department, Moving Picture World, Drawer 727, Chicago, Ill.

By Clarence E. Sinn, The "Cue Music Man."

First Article.

Much has been said in criticism of the music accompanying moving pictures, but so far as I have noticed few practical suggestions have been offered which would put the novice on the right road to "working up" his pictures musically. I am daily in receipt of inquiries whose general purport is: "What shall I play—where shall I play it—and why?" It is the purpose of these articles to try and give a few hints along these lines which the writer hopes may stimulate interest among his fellow-workers in this great field, and invite questions which will be answered so far as lies in his power.

The moving picture is almost infinite in its variety of subjects, but for the present we may divide them roughly into three classes: scenic, industrial, and dramatic—the last including all pictures in which the characters enact a story. The moving picture drama (or photoplay) is simply a play in pantomime, and the accompanying music is essentially the same as that of a play given on the stage. There is this distinction, however. In the drama proper, music is only introduced at intervals to heighten the effect of certain scenes, while in pantomime it is continuous, or nearly so. The reason is apparent. The drama depends upon both speech and action to convey its story: the eye and ear of the auditor are in sympathy; we see the action and hear the words. This sympathy of eye and ear must exist else there is no sustained interest—no intelligent appreciation of the story. To hold this double interest the stage manager employs as accessories, lights, scenery, music—always keeping in view this sympathy between the eye and ear.

Pantomime depends solely upon the action to convey its story, and appeals to the eye alone. Now the ear demands gratification as well as the eye, and, to this end, music is employed, but whenever possible it should be consistent with the story and not merely a concert program on the side.

Certain forms of music are accepted as suitable accompaniments for certain situations; as soft and plaintive for pathetic scenes, stormy and turbulent for the violent ones, etc. All the emotions have some sort of musical analogy and if these are correctly applied the dramatic effect is heightened and the interest of the auditor is intensified. If, on the other hand, the music be incongruous, the attention is diverted and the interest is lessened. Bear in mind that the picture is the show—that it what the audience is paying for—and any accessory (musical or otherwise) should carry out and amplify the impression intended by the producer.

A picture was shown some time ago containing a scene wherein Pharaoh's daughter discovers the infant Moses in the bulrushes. The pianist played "Oh, You Kid." He got a laugh which is probably what he wanted, but at what a sacrifice. The whole picture was dignified and serious, and the music should have sustained that character throughout.

It is the general character of the picture which you must observe. Taken altogether, what is the predominant feature? Is it pathetic, mysterious, tragical or comical? Work up to this general effect whatever it is. The producer takes great pains to convey certain impressions and preserve a certain atmosphere, and it is his due that these unities be preserved so the audience may receive his story in the same spirit in which it is told. To begin with, you should have a good library, which in these days of cheap music is not difficult. A few marches and waltzes, though these are indispensible, are not sufficient. Long andantes such as "Traumerei," "Flower Song," "Angel's Serenade" and the like are useful. The intermezzo, valse lento, and gavottes make convenient "fill-ins" where the scene is neutral yet the general character of the picture is subdued or pathetic. Religious music, national airs (of different countries), Oriental music and dances are frequently called for. Popular songs are useful, especially in sentimental pictures and comedies. The titles of these, if well known, frequently carry out the suggestion of the picture, but care should be taken that the music is also in keeping with the scene. Don't try to get a laugh when none was intended, as it only cheapens your work and hurts the picture. Your library should also include some melodramatic music, such as mysterious, agitato, "Hurrys" for combats, storms, fire scenes, etc. These are in constant demand.

Overtures, medleys, popular selections, etc., have their place also, but as a general rule it is not wise to use them in dramatic pictures, as the chances are a lively movement will come at a time when you should be playing a slow one, and vice versa. I suspect this is at the bottom of a great many crticisms that have appeared lately. Some of the scenic and most of the industrial pictures as a rule do not require special music—there's a good place for your concert music. Once in a long time you will get a picture that runs in a dead level—no high lights or deep shadows—very difficult to shade musically, as nothing in particular happens. An overture or selection is probably as good as anything else, but be careful.

Some intensely dramatic pictures are tuned to one pitch, yet are full of suggestions as to the musical setting. "Auld Robin Gray" is a recent and easy example. We open the picture with the song "Auld Robin Gray" once through, the same as if we were taking up the curtain on the stage. As it would be monotonous to repeat the song over and over throughout the picture, we relieve it occasionally; "My Highland Laddie" in the first scene, Tosti's "Good-bye" at the parting scene—always filling in with the titular song. I heard the "Wedding March" played for the wedding scene; while this might be criticized, it accented the scene and did not detract from the general effect. After that "Auld Robin Gray" until the end with all the expression possible.

In the next article we will take up this matter of incidental music more in detail.

C. E. SINN.

Lawrence, Mass.—The Marquise is one of the best and neatest picture houses here and one of the most popular. It has a seating capacity of three hundred and fifty and with its fine program of Independent pictures has had almost daily occasion to use the S. R. O. sign.

NEW YORK CARDS.

In answer to many queries from New York operators, I will say that:

(a) Every license card given out during 1910 is and will be good until one year from its date of issue, regardless of how the card itself reads.

(b) Whether or no one must be re-examined to secure renewal of same at expiration rests wholly in the discretion of the department officials. If his record is clear, he will probably not be re-examined. If it is not, he probably will be, and there you are.

Another Kind of Connection.—Rhode Island (name of town suppressed) writes: "I am an operator; or perhaps we had better call it a 'crank turner,' being somewhat new at the business. This is my third year operating. As regards that Weatherford, Okla., wiring proposition for which San Francisco sent you a sketch, I desire also to submit one. I do not know whether it would go or not, but think from a practical standpoint it would. So far as the failure to pull switches in the proper way is concerned, I believe the operator who would forget is not a capable man. An operator must have his whole mind on his business, else he will not secure good results."

Rhode Island's sketch shows a double throw, double pole switch. He cuts in the extra rheostat with a single pole knife switch. Rhode Island is quite right about competent operators not making a mistake in pulling the switches. Unfortunately, however, the really competent operator is in the minority, though I hope that this condition will readily disappear and that in the very near future I shall be able to say exactly the reverse.

Film Cement Formula.—A. R. Lawrence, Circuit Manager, Bijou Theaters, Edmonton, Alta., Canada, asks for a formula for or "prescription" from which druggists there can make up a good N. I. film cement in quantity.

We have no such formula in our possession. However, the following parties have advertised a film cement formula in the Moving Picture World and from one of them you no doubt can secure a satisfactory "prescription." I would, however, before purchasing, require them to send a sample of the cement. The names are: G. L. Barrows, 283 Halstead street, E. Orange, N. J.; J. H. Keinz, 714 E. Baltimore street, Baltimore, Md; Keith's Theater, Altoona, Pa.

A Beautiful Picture.—From Duluth, Minn., comes a panoramic photograph of the great Mahoning iron mine, one of the curiosities of the world. It was addressed to the editor personally and on the wrapper was the address of the Orpheum Theater, Duluth, Minn. Who sent it, I do not know, but nevertheless the guilty party has my sincere thanks for the beautiful photograph. I have viewed the mine personally, which makes the picture of all the greater value.

Another Drawing.—Bartlesville, Okla., sends in an excellent drawing of the double connection which came too late to be published last week. He writes in part as follows: "Friend Rich, or Rich friend if you don't object, for a friend who gives the advice you do is most certainly a friend worth while, or a 'rich friend'." Bartlesville then describes his drawing, the distinctive feature of which is that he suggests using a No. 12 steel wire, or telephone wire, in sufficient amount for resistance instead of the regular rheostat, coiling the said wire up into coils, of course. He then continues: "I am not the best operator in the State, but also not the poorest. I am not getting the highest wages in the State, but I have the best boss there is and a steady job, so I can't afford to quit."

I am sorry your drawing didn't come in time to be published, and that applies to quite a few other sketches submitted. I was agreeably surprised that so many of our readers were able to figure out such a clever piece of wiring.

That Focus Question.—Montreal, Can., contributes the following: "I noticed your article concerning the picture being out of focus on one side (page 1050, November 5 issue) and you certainly are on the right trail now. I had that same trouble about two years ago and found the image of the aperture didn't strike the center in the front lens. This was caused by the springs in the lens jacket not being bent exactly alike, which threw the lens a shade out of line with the gate. You will notice in most lens jackets there are four springs to hold the lens—or tube—securely, and when one is bent more than the other three the lens cannot be even. This is hardly noticeable to the naked eye, but if the aperture plate itself is not to one side, this certainly is the cause of the trouble. I have noticed also that when a condenser is dirty or badly cracked, it will affect the focus."

Many thanks for your hint, Neighbor. Ideas are always welcome. I pass them on to our readers. If experiment shows them to fit an individual case, well and good; if not, then perhaps the hint conveyed will point out the way to finding the real trouble. Glad to hear from you, Montreal, at any time.

Light Spot.—Bowling Green, Ky., writes as follows: "Having had some trouble in getting the spot just right, I am in position to give advice to 'Putnam, Conn.,' (October 22 issue). To make the spot larger, move condensers and machine head closer together or use condenser of longer focus. Either the lamp house or the machine head, or both, may be moved as is most convenient. The same result may also be obtained, to some extent, by substituting 7½ condensers for 6½."

Bowling Green expresses the right sentiment when he says he is willing to impart any information he may possess. If there is anything in this world that makes me tired, it is the man who possesses knowledge and guards it almost with a shot-gun lest someone discovers it and become as wise as he. Such an attitude is utterly silly. The man who takes such a position simply succeeds in standing in his own light. He is very careful not to help anyone else and pretty soon the other fellow discovers the fact and is likewise very careful not to help him. He is but one and the "other fellow" numbers thousands; therefore, he is bound, in the long run, to be the loser. Bowling Green's advice must be followed with caution, since moving the lamp house and machine head closer together will, in some cases, develop ghost troubles. In other cases, however, it is entirely practical.

Bad Light.—Selina, Ohio, writes as follows: "I take the opportunity of asking a little help. Have a 50-foot throw with picture 7 by 9 feet 8 inches; use two 7½ condensing lenses. Have a new Powers lamp and am using Pink Label carbons; use 40 amperes of current. The diagram shows how my light appears on the screen. The top is as bright and white as anyone could wish, while the lower part is shadowy. The first thing I look for when we receive the World is the Trouble Department, which has helped me in many ways."

The sketch submitted shows the shadowy part to be almost half the curtain, the dividing line between bright and shadow being curved downward somewhat from the two sides, the shadowy part covering the lower one-third of the curtain. It is possible, Selina, that the shadow is caused by your carbons being set wrong, though I hardly think so. Also the arc being too high in relation to center of condensers would produce exactly the effect you describe. My guess on this proposition would be that the light rays are striking the edge of the opening in the operating room wall. If the wall is quite close to the lens they would not have to strike very much to produce trouble. It is also possible that some thin substance such as a few threads of waste or ravelings of cloth will be found inside the mechanism hanging down just enough to obstruct the light slightly. It is also possible that there is dirt or oil on the back end of your projection lens, though, of course, I presume you have examined into that. It is also barely possible that there is something wrong with your screen itself, though not probable. So summing the whole matter up, I am inclined to believe that the trouble lies either with your light rays striking the edge of the operating wall opening, or else in the set of your carbons. If none of my surmises prove correct, kindly write again, giving name of machine. Meanwhile be sure everything is in exact line from arc to front end of projection lens.

Poor Shows.—Waterloo, Ia., writes as follows: "The writer has, in the recent past, traveled from Rockford to Freeport; from there to Dubuque, and then to Waterloo, where he is now singing at the Dreamland Theater. In the towns named I found only a couple of theaters where the projection was even passably good. At one place in Rockford, the Colonial, the projection was very fair. In Freeport projection was all very poor. In Dubuque, Ia., it was fair, and in Waterloo, Ia., it is better, but not good. I believe I know what good projection is, having begun operating ten years ago last September. I ran the first machine I can ever remember being made at the time; the 'Kent Projector.' Am I not right? I have since used about every model of the Edison, Powers, Motiograph and the latest Pathe. Have used A. C. and D. C. current, from 100 to 500 volts, and have always succeeded in getting good results. In many places I have applied for a position only to be informed by the manager that he had the best operator in the State. When I viewed the picture, however, it would be dim, blurry and jumpy, and full of ghosts and shadows. Now, this condition of affairs is more the manager's fault than it is the operator's. If the manager does not know a good picture when he sees it, he is not, of course, in a position to tell whether the operator is producing good projection or poor projection."

Let us hope the day will soon come when reports of this kind will be the exception rather than the rule. It is a fact that managers need educating as much or even more than operators do. I, myself, have had managers brag to me about the picture they were projecting, only to find upon investigation that the picture was anything but first class. I have stood in front of a picture with a manager and had him rather swell up as he said, "There, Mr. Richardson, there is a picture you certainly cannot say anything against!" And when I pointed out to him half a dozen faults in the projection the man was absolutely astonished and would usually remark, "Well, I never noticed that before!" He would appear to be very much surprised, indeed. The fact of the matter was the manager was utterly ignorant of what constituted good projection. How, then, could he be in position to judge the work of the operator? Any manager who finds this shoe fits may have the pleasure of wearing it; and to them I would remark that it is very much up to the manager to get busy and learn, at least, the rudiments of his business. I would say further, Mr. Manager, that common sense ought to tell you that the man who is willing to work for $10 or $12, or even $15 a week is not in the very nature of things a high class man (I speak of city work now, of course). Understand, this applies as a general rule, to which there are, of course, a few exceptions. Once in a while you will find a really high class man—that is to say, a high class operator—who, through peculiar reasons, will be willing to work cheap. It may be the show is right near his home. It may be the hours are such that it fits in with his general scheme of things. It may be for other reasons; but, as a general proposition, the work of the cheap man is cheap. That, Mr. Manager, you can put in your pipe and smoke it. The "Kent" machine was not the first projector. It was one of the early experimental machines, of which there were very many.

Trouble With Light, Etc.—Sidney, N. Y., writes as follows: "I would like to ask a question or two as follows: Our picture is 7 by 9 feet. Would its brilliancy be affected if the curtain be set back about 8 feet in an alcove, as shown in sketch? I have some trouble with my light. When I turn up the carbons the light will dim down for a few seconds before brightening up. Am using transformer and connections are all tight."

The setting of your curtain back in an alcove, as shown in sketch, will in no wise affect its brilliancy, provided you keep it the same width as now. You will, of course, have to make the flare of the alcove wide enough so that a person sitting in the front end seats will have a clear view of the entire picture. As to the arc trouble I am unable to determine from the data in hand just what is wrong. By "turning up the carbons," I presume you mean when you separate them to spring the arc or start the light. You will have, however, to give me more complete data before I can help you in this matter.

That Out-of-Focus Matter Again. Union City, Pa., sends in an excellent drawing of the three-pole switch connection and says, "I tried your 'shifting the lens stunt' (page 1051, November 5 issue) some years ago and decided that if you have the lamp aperture and lens in perfect line the picture will have the same focus all over. Suppose, however, the condenser was one sixteenth of an inch to the left of a straight line through the center of the condensers and aperture plate and projection lens. The rays on the right would pass through less glass than those on the same plate of the left of the condenser. Again: Suppose the lamp was not in perfect line with the head. In this case, the light would pass diagonally through the aperture and the rays would be distorted by the projection lens. As to the problem solved on page 1050, I should think the condensers would project instead of condensing."

Boiled down, Union City's idea is that everything from the arc to the front end of the projection lens should be exactly in line. That is to say, a line drawn from the center of the crater to the arc and to the center of the front end of the objective lens should be exactly in the center of the aperture, the condensing lenses and the back end of the objective lens. This is perfectly correct and is no more than has been heretofore pointed out in this department. The sketch Union City speaks of on page 1050 was put in bottom side up. If he will turn the paper wrong side up and look at this sketch it will look different.

From the Golden West.—San Francisco (M. E. Greenwald) sends the following: "Enclosed please find diagram of what I consider the proper solution of the mystery submitted by my worthy brother ('A Correction', page 1051, November 5 issue). I assure you I shall anxiously await the next number of your most valuable Trouble Department, as I am very desirous to know who this brainy young man might be. I wish the World all the success and prosperity I feel sure is due it for its square dealing in all matters."

San Francisco's diagram is correct and is likewise excellent. I do not think Neighbor Greenwald meant to be sarcastic in speaking of the "brainy young man." If I thought he did, I would give him a calling down, but I am sure he did not. The brother who submitted the first sketch and corrected me for having myself submitted a very poor wiring diagram did a distinct service. More than that, he did that service in the right way by asking me to call for ideas instead of publishing his own diagram. And I say still further that the excellence of his sketch and the general tone of his letter indicates that he is brainy, and I only wish that I might have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance of both Mr. Hugel and my good friend Greenwald.

A Most Excellent Letter.—Alfred J. Dockstader, Savannah, Ill., contributes the following excellent letter:

"In November 5 issue your answer to Havre de Grace seems to be to be correct, having proven to my own satisfaction that what may be termed 'unequalized setting' of the picture in the M. P. lens produces the 'out-of-focus' effect complained of. If the machine head be found to be square with the condensers then it is quite possible that a particle of dirt has worked in and hardened in such manner as to throw the framing carriage a trifle out of square with the lens. If the trouble is on the right side of the screen, examine the left side of the framing carriage and vice versa. If the carriage is O. K. then the trouble is in the lens itself. The regular M. P. lens is seldom or never true in its mount. I have used lenses of both domestic and foreign make and have yet to find one without this particular fault, though some are worse than others. To prove it just revolve a lens tube in its jacket and see how much the picture moves on the screen. The remedy at hand is to use the talcum powder as you suggest and true up the lens mount until the image of the aperture registers exactly central on the front lens. Then move the machine itself until the light registers right on the screen.

"As regards the pasting of rings of paper on the front and back lens, as recently suggested by a brother operator, I cannot agree with this method of rectifying the out-of-focus difficulty. It has a decided effect on the picture, making it sharper, but it cuts down the light and is therefore expensive in operation. I desire to thank brother Masse of Kallispell, Mont., for submitting sketch and description of his automatic tension re-winding device. I built one and it works perfectly. Let me make a suggestion, however: why not use a rubber roller instead of plush—such a one as the Edison people use for sprocket idlers? It is relieved in the center and would not, therefore, bear on the film except at the edges. Should a piece of film happen to catch in a plush roller it might start a war on the first patch which did not happen to be firmly cemented. Mr. Masse deserves due credit for the excellence of his idea.

"Out here we average 25 day subjects, but in spite of the 'whiskers' (age) manage to put up fairly good projection. I have introduced the World to dozens of new MEN in the operating field and it is surprising to note the effects on the screen."

Many thanks, Neighbor Dockstader, for your letter. I had to leave out a part of it because I couldn't quite understand your ideas as you set them forth. It is flattering to know that the reading of this paper improves projection. In other words, it is pleasant to know that one is succeeding in what one has attempted. Neighbor Dockstader has letterheads printed on paper which would do credit to a national bank. In one corner they read "Positively nothing but clear, steady pictures."

An Enterprising Manager.—John Blohm, owner and manager Blohm's Bijou Theater, Chesley, Ont., contributes the following: "We have several photoplay theaters here in Western Ontario, though, as the enclosed post card shows, they are on a small scale. The towns here are small, ranging from 1,500 to 3,000 population. Every one of the photoplay theaters I have installed, however, is on a paying basis. Why? Because I have the very best projection possible. [Hurrah for you, Neighbor!—Ed.]. I am running 'junk,' of course, as I cannot afford a later service, but the pictures do not look like it at all. I have put in a number of shows and most of them have new machines and I think I can claim to have had a little experience. I notice in our World there are a number of exhibitors who cannot get an exact focus all over their screen. Now, as I already said, I have installed a number of new machines and I have yet to have the right combination of projection lenses sent with a machine outfit. I now have an extra lens tube, which I know is perfect. Whenever I find lens trouble at other places, J just put my old reliable tube in and 'presto change'! the pictures are perfectly clear.

"With Biograph reels of film I have had the same trouble as have others, but I have never had this trouble with other makes of film. It is too bad, as the Biograph slow-moving pictures are A-1. As you see on the post card, my operating booth is in the window. We sometimes throw a picture across the street onto a wall by holding two mirrors in front of the lens. This is done as an ad., of course. I call my houses 'Photo Play Theaters.' In my opinion, photoplay is the picture in the film, but not the proper name for the picture theater. I forgot to mention that my machine does not face the curtain square, but the focus is perfect nevertheless."

The above letter is worthy of careful study and consideration. As regards the Biograph film, I take it the trouble referred to is the buckling back and forth across the aperture complained of by so many others. I called this matter to the attention of the Biograph people two or three times, but received no satisfaction. Therefore, I have ceased troubling them. The placing of the machine in the window is something I have long since advocated, my idea being to face the street side of the operating room with plate-glass, paint the interior of the operating room white and put the operator in a white uniform; the only objection to this being the amount of light let into the theater through the look-out holes in the daytime unless the street side be darkened with a black curtain. Properly done, it would prove a novelty as an advertisement. Neighbor Blohm is evidently a hustler from Hustleville, and we hope to hear from him again in the near future.

As to the matter of projection lenses sent with outfits, I am obliged to agree with Neighbor Blohm to the extent that the lenses sent along with machine outfits are too frequently of the variety "made to sell." Particularly is this true where machines are bought of none too scrupulous dealers who, to my certain knowledge, in many cases, remove the very fair quality of lens provided by the machine manufacturer and substitute in its place the cheapest thing that can possibly be obtained in the way of a projection lens. Such work is most decidedly reprehensible, but nevertheless is practiced by a good many unscrupulous dealers. Reputable houses would not countenance any such proceeding. The distortion of focus, due to the machine setting to one side of the curtain, would not be appreciable with a really good lens, but as was pointed out in a recent article in this department, the least bit of strain placed on a poor lens will cause trouble.

Powers No. 5 Outside Shutter.—On page 809, October 8 issue, is seen the cut of a Powers No. 5 machine equipped with an outside shutter, constructed by a correspondent in Seattle, Washington. Seattle writes again saying that after two months' run, 12 hours per day, this shutter is as good as ever and is giving most excellent satisfaction. Seattle also invented a little device to be attached to the Powers No. 6, designed to prevent surplus oil from getting on the film and says the attachment works perfectly but the Powers people were not interested, merely saying that there would be no trouble about oily film if the operator was careful not to use too much oil.

Glad to know the shutter is delivering the goods, Seattle. As regards the device you mention, I think you do not quite understand. In the first place, the position of the intermittent oil cup on that machine has been changed in such a way that the difficulty about surplus oil has been removed. Also let me say that the attachment of a device, even though it be a small one, to moving picture machines may involve more trouble and expense than you dream of. This you could not rightly understand without being thoroughly acquainted with factory practice in the manufacture of projection machines. Sometimes a little change that looks like almost nothing at all will cost anywhere from $25 to $200 merely for changing expensive steel dies.

It Worked.—Adrian, Mich. (Clyde J. Mills, Crescent Theater), writes as follows: "I would like to refer to 'Lighting the Interior' (page 989, October 29 issue). I tried your plan and it has made a great improvement in our theater and the patrons like this theater the best of the three in this city. We run Independent pictures and they do certainly make a hit here.

"This is the way I fixed the lights. I had four ceiling house lights, using Tungsten lamps. I took out the Tungstens and put on porcelain shades, green outside and white inside, with 8 candle power lamps, and it works very good. The light spreads out to within about three feet of the curtain, but it does not affect the eyes or picture and you can sit any place in the theater and read the finest newspaper print. If this idea is any good, please publish it; if not, throw it away.

"Here is one on me. I am using an American (Standard) machine and my lower lamp wire gets so hot that I cannot touch it. It gets hot just about a foot from the lamp and the rest of the wire is cold. Can you tell me what to do about it? I am an operator. By this I mean an operator and not a 'crank turner.' I have had seven years' practical experience and would like to join some operators' union. Can you refer me to the best place?"

The shades used by Friend Mills, were the ordinary porcelain electric light shades, green outside and white inside. They are cone shaped but with rather a wide flare. It is funny, Neighbor Mills, but just a day or two before I got your letter I saw some of those shades in an office and thought to myself that they would possibly work all right in a theater.

As to the wire matter, in all probability if you strip back the insulation you will find the wire to be a dark brown, showing that it has been overheated and burned. The remedy is to cut away the burned portion. There are other things which might cause the condition you describe, but I think you will find this to be the trouble. As to a Union, I would suggest you to put in your application with Chicago Union, it being, so far as I know, the nearest one to you. I do not at this writing know the address of their headquarters, but believe that a letter addressed to the Chicago Operators' Union care of Wm. Havill, 107 Madison street, will reach them all right. By the way, I am thinking seriously of moving to Adrian myself, since viewing the ladies lined up at the front of your theater. Sorry photo was too poor to reproduce.

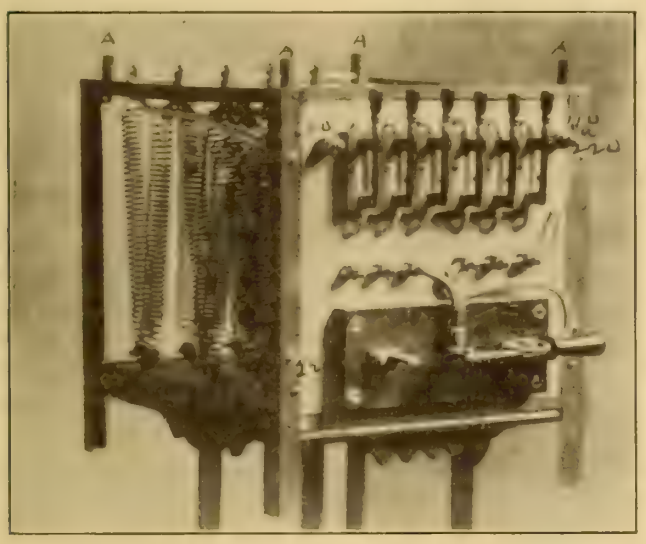
Rheostat.—St. Paul, Minn. (Geo. M. Pringle), is here again with the following: "Friend Richardson: One of the projection necessities is a rheostat capable of delivering ample current to meet all demands. The one illustrated consists of six units for use on 110 volts or three units of two cells each on 220 volts. Each unit is connected, at the rear, with the supply wire. In front it is cut in or out by means of a single pole switch. The three units at the left are connected with the center pole of the D. T., S. P. switch. When this switch is as shown you may use all six cells in parallel (multiple). If thrown the other way you connect in series for 220 volts. If used for two lamps, one is taken off the double throw and the other off binding post in upper right-hand corner. The resistance wire is Nichrome, each unit having 5.31 ohms resistance at 75 degrees Fahr. At 500 degrees the resistance increases to 6 ohms. Control of the arc is almost perfect. The following figures were taken from volt and ammeter after four days' trial on D. C. Carbons used were Bio ⅝ cored top and Electra ½ solid below, also Electra ⅝ cored above and same ½ inch solid below. With both carbons the reading was practically the same. Any one of the units on 110 gave, when wires and carbons were cold, 14 amperes, but when both were heated this was cut down to 10 amperes. Two cells gave 20, three 30, four 40, five 45 to 47 and six gave 54 to 58. The proportionate drop in the last two tests is, in my opinion, due to the fact that above 40 amperes the carbon resistance becomes excessive, between 40 and 50 amperes being the full working capacity of that size carbons. Anything above that is largely waste, besides requiring very close attention. The line pressure was 120 volts, with 60 at the arc. On 220 one pair in series gave 14 amperes, two pairs gave 28 and three pairs gave 39 to 41.



"The four posts marked 'A' are to hold the cover. There is something about a rheostat and arc in series which is hard for me to understand, keeping in mind Mr. Edison's letter to you (page 940, June 4 issue) in which he says that through the arc and rheostat there must be a total drop in voltage equal to the line voltage. This rheostat and the experiments above described set forth something very hard to grasp. One unit gave 10 amperes with 60 volts across the arc. Ohm's law would show this to indicate 6 ohms resistance in the arc (don't see where you get that from. The total resistance is 11 ohms. Sixty volts at the arc would give 60÷10, or six ohms in the rheostat cell, which would leave 5 ohms as the arc resistance.—Ed.) while six cells in parallel, by the same law, gives but 1 ohm. How arc resistance can vary so much is a mystery to me, but I'm after it and won't give up until the riddle is solved! I have often met operators who were using 60 to 75 amperes (??) without the least trouble. I have a suspicion that an amateur would show nearer 25! Charles Bell, Chief Operator at The Gayety Theater, this city, acted with me in these tests and concurs in correctness of figures given. The rheostat may be built by anyone. All the tools I had were a breast drill and a few taps."

The foregoing letter is most excellent and deserves close study. The rheostat is indeed flexible. As to the resistance problem, darn it, St. Paul, you've set me figuring again. I was trying to steer clear of that particular stump. Cannot you send sketch, or description showing just how you made the various wire connections. Doubtless many of our readers will want to make a rheostat and while, from what you have said, the thing could be figured out, still a detailed description or sketch of all connections would help. We thank you for what you have already done.

Ventilating Fans.—Savannah, Ga., inquires what make of wall fan is best.

It is not within the office of this department to recommend any particular brand of goods, though the temptation to do so sometimes is very strong. Almost any well built fan is good. Conversely, almost any cheap fan is a mighty poor article and exceedingly costly in the long run. In buying fans, see to it that the angle of the blades is reasonably heavy, which means a large movement of air at a comparatively low speed; hence less noise, as well as less consumption of current per cubic foot of air moved. Look more at the excellence of the construction than you do at the price.

Try Paying Decent Salaries.—Burlington, Ia., writes as follows: "My operator has shadows and poor light. Have tried changing operators but have secured no improvement. Can you suggest any remedy?"

Yes, Burlington, I think I can suggest a remedy. Supposing you try paying a sufficient salary to secure a really competent man. Of course, I realize that this is a radical suggestion, but nevertheless until you adopt it you are not likely to secure much of anything else except shadows and other like performance on the screen of your theater. You may ask how I know you are not paying a decent salary, as you did not tell me. I do not know it but I am just making a good, safe guess. Poor work, as a general proposition, goes hand in hand with a cheap operator. The man who is paying for good service won't, as a general proposition, stand for anything but good results. If he does, he is something more than seven different kinds of a chump.

Figuring Resistance.—Chicago, Ill., presents the following inquiry: "How can I tell what number of amperes I would get through two 110-volt, 25-ampere rheostats working on 220 volts pressure. I claim under these conditions the rheostats would be overloaded; others claim they would not. Who is right?"

You are right. The rheostats would be overloaded. You would be pulling about 33 1-3 per cent. amperes of current. The way to figure it is as follows: First find the resistance of one of the 110-volt, 20-ampere rheostats. To do this, proceed as follows: Subtract 45 from 110 (the drop across the arc from the voltage) and divide the remainder by 25, that being the capacity of the rheostat, working on 110 volts. The result will be a given number of ohms, which represents the actual resistance of the rheostat itself. Note carefully that if you merely divide 110 by 25 you will have the total resistance of the rheostat and the arc, not the resistance of the rheostat itself. Now, multiply the resistance of one rheostat by two, which will give you the total resistance in ohms of two 110-volt, 25-ampere rheostats.

Next, subtract 45 from 220, which leaves 175. Divide this by the ohms resistance in the above rheostats and the result will be the number of amperes you will get from two 25-amperes, 110-volt rheostats connected in series with each other and the arc, working on 220 volts.

I have proven this rule out by actual experiments with an ammeter and all experiments have shown it to be practically correct. I say "practically" instead of absolutely, for the reason that while I take 45 as a constant for the drop across the arc, the actual arc drop varies from 40 to 60. The constant of 45 is near enough, I believe, to answer all ordinary purposes. Remember, also, that this applies to new rheostats; old ones have a somewhat higher resistance.

A CORRECTION.—In Neighbor Hugel's drawing (page 1170, November 19 issue), by using a condenser lens as a magnifier it will be seen that the jumper connecting the lower center and lower right-hand poles of the switch is labeled "C." A paragraph in letter accompanying the drawing reads: "By adding a second jumper ('C') the rheostats could also be used in multiple on the D. C. side." When I printed the sketch I forgot the above paragraph and thus got Neighbor Hugel "in bad," for which I ask his pardon.—Editor.

Gentle reader, J'ai Mal de Tete. And I have got it bad. It won't succumb to any of the known remedies, medicinal or otherwise. The smelling bottle is powerless. I have tried to sleep it off. But nary bit will that same Mal de Tete budge. Like the moving picture it appears to have come to stay. Unlike the moving picture it is not pleasant to have to put up with.

Yes, indeed, I've got a headache and a very bad headache, too. It is caused by a recent variation in the reading matter which I employ as a soporific. I confess to being an omnivorous reader. I can enjoy reading advertisements of any kind, quite as much as Elinor Glyn's "Three Weeks," or the Decameron, or Byron. Advertisements are just as romantic to me, just as inspiring, just as stimulating, as any other form of reading matter. Can you possibly find anything more romantic than the clairvoyant page of the Sunday "New York Herald"? Human documents, if you like, appealing to the imagination of the superstitious, and those who, if they could, would tear aside the curtain of the future. Parenthetically, I am one of those who think that the less we poor mortals know about the future, the better for our present happiness.

The specimen of literature that has given me a headache is nothing less than the Picture Trust Agreement. The Licensed Agreement, the Charter, if I may so call it, of the Motion Picture Patents Company and of the associated manufacturers, and the headache of which I complain has been caused by my efforts to master its legal intricacies and subtleties.

This licensed agreement is a fearful and wonderful production. It consists of an agreement by and between the Motion Picture Patents Company, the Edison Manufacturing Company, and Blank. Blank represents all and any of the Associated Manufacturers. If I understand this document aright, it binds the associated manufacturers to the Edison Company, otherwise the Patents Company, body and soul, till August 31, 1914. To quote Mr. Dyer: "Until August 31, 1914, at least as I interpret the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, no one can make a camera having these features without embodying Mr. Edison's invention and in infringement of his patent." This is patent No. 12037, dated September 30, 1902, and No. 12192, dated January 12, 1904, the vital patent of the moving picture machine. Even so, the associated manufacturer is not out of his trouble even on August 31, 1914. There is another patent which can be renewed from 1914 to August 26, 1919.

My interpretation of this agreement is, therefore, that none of the associated manufacturers can get out of it for the next nine years without running the risk of an action for infringement by the Edison Company or the Motion Picture Patents Company: the two things mean the same. Of course the manufacturers have a yearly option of renewing the agreement, but if they decide not to renew what are they going to do about it? They cannot get Eastman film even if they could get non-infringing cameras. They are in a worse plight than the Independent manufacturers of to-day. As I have said they are bound body and soul to the Edison-Motion Picture Patents Company by this remorseless agreement.

It is a nice thing for the "licensor" and his agents to get half a dozen prosperous firms acknowledging the validity of a number of very shadowy patent rights and agreeing to pay them fat royalties. In other words, these associated manufacturers practically give the Patents Company and the Edison Company a direct interest in their businesses. The Biograph Company, the Vitagraph Company, Mr. Selig and Mr. Spoor, the Kalem Company and Mr. Lubin and the Melies Company are just working for the enrichment of Mr. Edison and his friends. That is the interpretation which any man of the world will place upon this licensed agreement. Several of the licensed manufacturers have hinted that if they could get out of this agreement they would. Several of them have said that they regret ever having signed it. I should think they do. Especially when they have before them the spectacle of fifteen Independent manufacturers making pictures, selling them at a profit, and not paying a cent of royalty to anybody.

True though it is that the vital patent of the group of fourteen or fifteen patents owned or controlled by the Patents Company was sustained in litigation by the Circuit Court of Appeals in New York, it is permissible to inquire whether the decision given by that Court is beyond repeal. I have spoken to two or three eminent patent lawyers on the subject and they assured me that the Circuit Court of Appeals in New York is not the final court of appeal in this matter. It would be interesting if some legal reader of the Moving Picture World would let us have his ideas on this point. There is another aspect of this licensed agreement which presents itself. Is it not ultra vires? Is it legal for a trading firm to sign away its liberty of action for a period of ten or eleven years under compulsion and what looks very much like a threat? This is a nice point. I, for one, would not be surprised if this licensed agreement were taken into court, to find that a level headed judge would pronounce it an illegal document.

Does it not also come under the Sherman Law which hits at restraint of trade? For example: the licensee convenants to use exclusively sensitized film manufactured and sold in the United States by a manufacturer or manufacturers designated by the licensor. In other words the licensed manufacturers can only use film manufactured by a firm approved of by the Edison and Associated Manufacturers. Is not this action in restraint of trade? I think it is. Another interpretation to be put upon this agreement, and I think a very fair one, is that it stops invention. It is not worth the while of any one of these licensed manufacturers to think out and apply any ideas of his own, either in regard to machinery or films. He practically binds himself to use only one kind of machinery for the space of ten years. He binds himself to use only one kind of film; only one kind of perforation. So the agreement not only violates the principles of freedom of trade, but it stops invention.

Pushed to its logical end, this agreement practically controls the businesses of these licensed manufacturers in any one and every one of their departments. So it works out. It is within my knowledge that when an employee, either voluntarily or involuntarily, leaves one trust house he cannot possibly obtain employment in another. Say, for example, that a cameraman should leave Mr. Spoor, Mr. Lubin would not employ him. A nice state of things, don't you think, in this country where liberty and justice is held inviolable and inviolate? Again, I ask, is not such action illegal?

Who can wonder, therefore, that these licensed manufacturers are chafing under the yoke and would be free. I conjecture that when many of them signed this agreement they hardly knew what they were doing. They have practically signed away their freedom for ten years. They have a choice of two evils: To continue in captivity and share their profits with somebody else, or to strike for freedom, be masters in their own houses and masters of their own businesses.

Hackensack, N. J.—The Royal Theater, owned by Hayden & Royall, opened in September, has been compelled by the pressure of growing business to enlarge. An addition of fifteen feet is being put on which will enable the owners to make a number of needed improvements.

This house is showing Independent films, and there is no question about their popularity. A forced enlargement in less than three months is sufficient evidence of that fact. A Power's machine is used and the projection is without a flaw. The house seats 240, and is full from the time it opens, at three o'clock, until it closes, at eleven. The program consists of three reels and a song for ten cents, with five cents for children in the afternoon.

The Bijou Theater is putting up an elaborate ornamental front. This meant the rebuilding of a considerable portion of the front of the building and improvement throughout. Mr. Dechert, the proprietor, aims to give a good show. He presents three reels and a song for a program, with five cents for children in the afternoon.

Chicago Notes.

M'QUADE HARD PRESSED FOR COPY.

There is a Windy City newspaper man who accuses us of having different opinions on certain films. He does not realize that it is a hard matter to find two men with the same taste and ideas. Our New York representative, who saw "Bertie's Elopement," saw it the first day, consequently with its title, and most likely he did not note that while it was pitch dark night at the scene of the ladder it was bright daylight when the elopers reached the carriage. When I saw "Bertie's Elopement" I noticed the blunder and, as the film was 30 days old, the title was missing.

Now that the correspondent of the "Index" has aroused the curiosity of the exhibitors many of them will try to remember the film and will surely agree with me that "Bertie's Elopement" is no credit to its producer. Such controversy will hurt, more or less, the reputation of the manufacturer, one of the owners of the "Index." Now, for the beam in the eye of the versatile correspondent: Only a week ago, when he had an advertisement from a pipe organ manufacturer, he used his most fluent language to make believe that the pipe organ was the only proper music for motion pictures. Now that the advertisement has been cancelled, the "Index" has a long article condemning the use of the pipe organ. Many exhibitors have invested large sums in pipe organs and will be surprised to-day to hear that they had been deceived by a mere newspaper correspondent. J. M. B.

YET ANOTHER KNOCKER.

A certain operator named J. J. Sullivan, working for the Janet Theater, utilizes his spare time to help fill the pages of the "Moving Picture Abuse" with unreliable news—this under the initials of J. J. S.

J. J. Sullivan is one of those men to offer you the glad hand when you face him and hurl a stone at you the moment that you turn your back—like his master, the organ grinder.

On Thursday, November 10, I called at the Janet Theater to compliment Manager Hyman on his praiseworthy courage in showing "Nero," a repeater one year old. Sullivan, wishing a little of the credit, left his booth to join us. He was so pleased to see me, yet at the same time he was writing to his paper a lot of gaff on my account—just to fill space.

My answer to Sullivan is a general denial.

In reference to the Orpheum Theater, if Sullivan wishes to take a copy of the Moving Picture World of May 7 he will find that we gave them even a harder knock on the lights than I gave them this month. To-day I give to the Orpheum the same praise for their good music as I did last Spring, and to back up this fact I am pleased to inform our readers that I have secured the services of C. E. Sinn, of the said Orpheum Theater, to prepare articles on "Music."

If Sullivan is not satisfied with the above, I will refer the different articles on the Orpheum Theater to impartial judges to decide if what was said was not just and fair and uninfluenced by advertising patronage.

If Sullivan wishes to read the copies of May 23, of August 27, etc., he will see that I have always praised the Janet Theater, where he is employed, although an Independent house.

It will be better for J. J. S. to stick to his operating booth, as a newspaper correspondent cannot be fair and impartial if he works for either a manufacturer, renter or exhibitor. While Alf. may be pleased with his pupil's dope, I doubt if Mr. Hyman will be as satisfied. As I have said before, Mr. Hyman is a broad-minded exhibitor, and surely he will not appreciate spiteful work on the part of his operator. J. M. BRADLET.

A DELIGHTFUL EVENING.

After a day of hard work, it is a pleasure to meet some exhibitors who do not try to make your lot more miserable with sad stories, but greet you with a smile and who have something interesting to tell you for the good of the business in general.

It is also a great pleasure to meet broad-minded exhibitors who do not believe in the foolish ideas of those who want to give an extra-long show, without regard to the quality, who raise all sorts of fuss with the exchanges if they are given a repeater, who have forced the best productions to be shown once, then shelved forever. Yes, it is a relief to meet broad-minded men, who welcome a repeater when the film is good enough to be repeated.

It was a shock to some film men to hear that the Hyman Bros., of the Janet Theater, were going to show "Nero; or the Burning of Rome," a film of Ambrosio, released September 1, 1909. If I had taken this idea under my arm and visited the moving picture theaters, to try to book it, the greater majority of them would have laughed at the idea of offering them a repeater over one year old. But Hyman Bros. are broad-minded, they are not afraid of repeaters and when they repeat films they do not try to sneak them in, but they advertise them. "Nero" was advertised since last Monday, and you skeptical exhibitors would have learned it you had visited the Janet on Thursday and seen for yourselves that repeaters are not a scare to the public but can draw a big attendance. Yes, "Nero" was shown on Thursday at the Janet Theater to crowded houses and the managers must have been pleased at the gate receipts.

Everyone was happy. Mr. Hyman was greatly gratified at the success, the lady cashier was all smiles, the ushers were kept busy, and even Mr. Sullivan, the chief operator, could not keep to himself the pleasure he had in projecting such a good picture on the wonderful Mirror Screen.

There are no roses without thorns, and I am sorry to say that such a splendid show was slightly marred by a film that should have never been released. Well, the Independents lack self-confidence and they look too much to the big Motion Picture Patents Company as their guide. In imitating the Licensed manufacturers some Independent manufacturers entrenched with the Sales Company believe that they can, like some of the Licensed side, show any old rot. A tramp to turn dog after eating a dog biscuit is not a very appropriate picture to be shown along with such a master production like "Nero." This remark is not against the management of the Janet Theater, as Messrs. Hyman Bros. can no more dictate to the Independent exchanges than a Licensed theater can dictate to the General Film Company; both Independent and Licensed exhibitors are at the mercy of the manufacturers.

From the Janet, we visited the Ideal. Who could pass the corner of Larrabee street and North avenue and not climb the two flights of stairs to at least shake hands with Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Gilmore? We know that George shows the best Licensed pictures, that he has an exceptionally good projection, a fine light and has made such a success of the "Ideal" (no better name could be found), that even old folks with ninety-one years on their shoulders do not hesitate to climb the two flights of stairs nightly for the sake of seeing good pictures. Gilmore had a surprise for me. He believes in the Moving Picture World, and, reading our articles on good music, he decided to give to his well-known pianist, Mr. Thompson, an able assistant in the person of Mr. Fleury, a professional drummer. Mr. Fleury can be called the little man behind the drum, as when in his pit, surrounded by his drums and traps, he is practically shielded from view, but if you do not see him, you certainly hear him, and with his eye glued on the picture, he never misses a sound effect. If our friend Gilmore knows how to give us a well-projected and steady picture, his pianist and his drummer certainly know how to still enhance the beauty of the picture by giving it life with proper sound effects and well-timed music.

Mr. Gilmore, like the Hyman Bros., does not object to repeaters; he does not see why a good picture cannot be repeated.

As I said at the start, this was a delightful evening. It is not work, but a pleasure, to visit such successful exhibitors. J. M. B.

WE SAY IT YET: "WHAT BECOMES OF THE TITLES?"

Several weeks ago when we started the above inquiry, we were "up a tree." Last week, through the reply of Jack Fallis, we were, figuratively, "sliding down the trunk." But now we are up in the topmost branches again. One of our visitors this week brought with him an envelope containing over a hundred pieces of film, ranging in size from ¼ to 1 inch square, that he had to cut out from a film sent him that had only been released ten days ago. No, Jack Fallis, we wont blame the "poor inspector" (who, as you say, has nothing but his two hands, his scissors, knife and little cement pot) in this patricular instance, for in all probability this reel was not inspected at all, at least not until the exhibitor himself did it. Are the exchanges too busy, or is it a rule not to inspect a film until it is "all shot to pieces?" This may be a trifle far fetched in regard to titles, but to all appearances it holds good for both; it gives us an inkling as to the true state of affairs. "Let George do it," seems to be the popular cry when it comes to inspection, and "George" in this case seems to be the "poor exhibitor" and not the "poor inspector." We say it yet: "What becomes of the titles?" J. C. K.

BOSTON THEATER MAKES IMPROVEMENT.

The Boston Theater, the pride of the Independents in the Loop, made an added improvement last week by installing a new curtain. It was rather difficult to procure a suitable one, as the Boston runs vaudeville in connection with the pictures, thereby necessitating the use of a roller curtain Through Verner R. Ronk they purchased an H. & H. curtain, Mr. Ronk being general agent for this territory. The H. & H curtain is proving very satisfactory to the management of the Boston and their patrons, a better picture is shown and, according to the statement of Manager Morville, this is being done with a decrease of 50 per cent. in the use of current. No doubt this newly patented curtain will be in great demand throughout the country by vaudeville and picture houses. J. C. K.

GOOD LIGHT NECESSARY.

The importance of the lamp used with a motion picture machine cannot be overestimated because unless a satisfactory light is obtained, all mechanical perfection of the mechanism, or artistic merit of the film, is nullified. G. B. Jones, proprietor of the Grand Theater, Lawrence, Kan., spares no effort to have everything of the best in his establishment and writes the World that the Motiograph produces the best light in the world. He goes farther, and asserts that he has never had a breakdown with the Motiograph and considers its dependability its main attraction.

THE STANDARD BRANCHING OUT.

Fred. J. Murphie, for the past two years connected with the Chicago office of the Standard Film Exchange, has gone to Sioux Falls., S. D., to take charge of the Standard's branch in that city. Mr. Murphie has a thorough knowledge of the moving picture business, and is certain to meet with favor at the hands of the exhibitors in the Northwest. We wish him every success. J. C. K.

We take pleasure in informing our readers that J. R. Edwards, the well-known film man, has purchased the Three Star Slide Company and moved the plant to more commodious quarters in the Temple Court building, 225 Dearborn street. With their increased facilities the Three Star Company will doubtless become prominent in the slide business, for Mr. Edwards is an enterprising young man, full of energy and ambition, and his courteous manner will no doubt make many friends for his new enterprise. J. C. K.

New England Notes.

Stark and Day are now in possession of the Lilly Theater, Florence, Mass., which they will operate as a photoplay theater.

William H. Lyons is building a large moving picture and vaudeville theater at Indian Orchard, Springfield, Mass.

The rumor has it that the Imperial Theater, of Providence, R. I., will soon change its policy to moving pictures and vaudeville. M. R. Sheedy and Sparrows & Edwards will run the house under the new policy in conjunction.

The Gilmore Theater, of Springfield, Mass., will also probably change its policy to moving pictures and vaudeville simultaneously with the Imperial of Providence. Mike Sheedy is also interested in The Gilmore.

The Lakeport Opera House, of Lakeport, N. H., has been opened by J. M. Ratee, who is showing licensed films and illustrated songs.

The German Opera House, Fairhaven, Vt., has been opened by J. H. Lincoln. Moving pictures and illustrated songs are offered.

Joseph Burton, manager of the Colonial Theater, Lowell, Mass., reports good business with pictures, songs and vaudeville as the attractions. It is a neat, cosy house with good all around facilities for business.

Manager F. O. Lambert, of Pawtucket, R. I., has recently taken over the Crown Theater of that city. Mr. Lambert certainly ought to make good, as his experience in this line is ample.

Gregory Contos, manager and proprietor of the Xenicon Temple, Roxbury, Mass., is probably doing a better business than the great majority of moving picture theaters in the small towns in and about Boston. Mr. Contos has enlarged his house two separate times, and now has a seating capacity of nearly 1,000. A good show of pictures, vaudeville and songs can always be seen at the Temple. Mr. Contos states that his Fall business has amply repaid him for the additional outlay made last Summer, while renovating and enlarging his house.

Ackers Family Theater, Bangor, Me., has a new manager in the person of R. E. Greene, formerly of the Congress Theater, Portland, Me.

Emil Gerstel paid his regular visit to Boston, recently, to look the trade over. These visits amply repay him, so Mr. Gerstel states, as they keep him in touch with all the latest kinks in the business.

Chas. Hodgdon, manager and owner of the Princess Theater, Wakefield, Mass, can be complimented on his success with his enterprise. The Princess was the first theater devoted to photoplay built in Wakefield, and never made any kind of a showing for its owners, until Mr. Hodgdon bought the house several months ago. The house now does an excellent business, and can be easily placed in the successful class of moving picture theaters. Licensed films and illustrated songs, added to Mr. Hodgdon's ability and square dealing with the public evidently turned the tide for the Princess. Mr. Hodgdon also has a successful little side business, that of booking illustrated singers for New England moving picture theaters.

LYNN, MASS.

The World's New England representative took a jaunt to Lynn, Mass., not so very long ago, and is pleased to record the following fact. The Olympic Theater, owned and personally managed by Mr. Horsman, is doing a land-office business, judging by what we saw. On a Friday afternoon, at 3:30 p. m., the house, seating 1,600 people, was completely filled, with a large number of people waiting for admittance. This speaks pretty well for the theater.

The Theater Comique, Lynn, Moe Mark proprietor, Al Newhall, resident manager, was also busy when viewed by the writer.

Work on the new Central Square Theater, to be devoted to moving pictures, in Lynn, is now nearly completed, and it is expected to open about November 1. This house, judged as far as it has gone, is what may be termed a "corker." It is large, spacious, and has an extremely beautiful and original lobby and front. The location on Central Square is excellent, as it is very centrally located in the crowded business district.

BOSTON, MASS.

The Jolliette Theater, Bowdoin Square, has reduced its admission price to five cents for children under 12 years of age. This particular locality has a large number of children, which accounts for the change of policy. The World's New England representative does not consider this a good policy to pursue. Whenever a house has a large percentage of children at its performances, it is often a deterrent in adults. It is difficult to hold the youngsters in check, as they often show their appreciation of a picture by too vociferous outbursts of applause taking the form of catcalls, etc.

Manager Joe Ruthe of the Jolliette enjoys the unique distinction of being the only manager of a Boston moving picture theater who has been with his house since its opening day. Independent films and illustrated songs are the attractions. Mr. Ruthe's idea of vaudeville in connection with moving pictures was recently clearly shown by a large poster, conspicuously placed in his lobby: "If you want vaudeville, go to B. F. Keith's theater; if you want moving pictures, come to this theater!"

The Back Bay Theater, 104 Dartmouth street, was recently surprised by the unexpected visit of a sheriff and his helpers. These men, who represented the builders of the theater, made a clean sweep, as they took away with them everything movable, from the moving picture screen to the doors. The present conductors of the house claim that this is something for which they are not to blame. They simply rented the theater from the original owners, who, evidently, did not pay their bills relating to the construction of the house. The house will be reopened in a short time, after putting things into proper shape. This theater has been using licensed films, a couple of vaudeville acts, and illustrated songs. One matinee performance, and two evening shows were usually given.

Readers of this column may remember that the World's New England representative, when writing of the Savoy Theater, Washington street, in the issue of October 29, had this to say: "Whether this change (of film service) plus the new manager (G. F. Whalen) will aid the Savoy, can only be conjectured, as it is a most doubtful question." This prediction has been verified, as the house has again made some drastic changes. On Monday, November 7, every employee of this house was given two weeks' notice to leave, including Mr Whalen. Albert Johnson, of Boston, is now in charge of the house. Johnson has had varied and expert experience in the conducting of moving picture theaters. He was connected with the Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, as manager of two of their Boston houses for several years. Whether any theater that has not been what could be called successful since its inception, can be made a winner by any man is a question time only will solve.

The writer submits the following authentic incident, and wishes the reader to draw his own personal conclusions therefrom. On Tuesday, October 1, there was the usual biweekly meeting of licensed exhibitors, at the office of the Genral Film Company, to choose their program for the latter end of that week from the whole number of releases. When these films had been run off, Frank Vine, manager for the company came into the room where the films were being shown, saying, "Here, boys, is a special release of Selig's, showing the Centennial Celebration in Mexico." The film was run off, but no one seemed willing to pay the $25 for its use for three days. A short time later, Mr. Vine decided that the film would be issued in his office, as a regular release, without additional charge. How about this special release, exhibitors? Is it, or is it not, a little side graft?

In this connection it may be interesting to note that only two of Boston's regular moving picture theaters contracted for the special release of the World's Series Baseball Games. The World's New England representative has something to say concerning special releases in general which may be found in this issue of the World.

The opening day of the new National Theater, Boston, has been delayed, owing to some fault in its construction. This house, which has a seating capacity of 4,000, is one of the largest theaters in this country. Although first undertaken by the Gordon Bros. Amusement Company, of Worcester, Mass., who operate a large chain of moving picture and vaudeville theaters in and about Boston, the National was taken over by B. F. Keith, while in the process of erection. This house will be reviewed in this journal by the World's New England representative, owing to its great size, the amount of money spent in its construction, and because it may be of general interest to note how Mr. Keith, the vaudeville king, will open his new house. Conservative estimates place the cost of this house at $250,000.

HENRY.

SAN FRANCISCO LETTER.

Judge Sturtevant decided October 28 that the Superior Court had no right to restrain the police from stopping any prize fight or other picture that the board of censors might object to.

Several weeks ago the Jeffries-Johnson pictures were stopped from being exhibited at the Valencia Theater and Manager Kaiser appealed to the court for an order restraining further interference.

Pending the court's decision, the pictures were exhibited in other places in the city, the police deferring any action until Judge Sturtevant's decision was handed down.

Benjamin Michaels, manager of the Silver Palace Theater, on Market street, and Victor L. Duhem, an Oakland photographer, were taken into custody on charges of grand larceny growing out of the disappearance of a set of the fight films that were on exhibition at the Valencia Theater on September 11.

Eight reels were found in the possession of Michaels and the originals in the possession of Duhem who was engaged in making dupes. Michaels had made all arrangements to go on a tour of the Philippine Islands with the pictures when arrested. He claims that he erected a tower at Reno and managed, by the aid of mirrors to take the pictures.

Both men were released on bail and immediately rearrested, at the instance of the Patents Company by the Federal authorities and charged with violating the copyright laws. They were taken before United States Commissioner Wright for a preliminary hearing and their cases set for November 7.

Manager Dahnken of the Elite Theater, was arrested by the censor board last week and charged with showing a picture that had been condemned. In justice to Mr. Dahnken, it must be said that the picture was a first run, and that the company making the subject in question has had a great many of their recent releases censored by the board. Considerable comment was caused by the summary action of the board and one prominent exchange man went so far as to say that the board favored the Independents. Of the films censored in the past month the majority were licensed. The Exhibitors' Association has taken the matter up and a thorough investigation will be made. The picture referred to was a Biograph, entitled "The Banker's Daughter."

The past week has been unique in the history of the picture houses in this city, seven new houses having been opened.

LOS ANGELES LETTER.

A New Screen.

California Motion Picture Manufacturing Company filed articles of incorporation, Saturday the 15th. From the records the company has a capital of $200,000 and is headed by M. F. Brooks, P. L. Howland, H. R. Davis, C. H. Lovell and M. C. Lovell. At this writing I have been unable to locate any of the gentlemen mentioned; however, if I succeed in securing an interview I shall inform you regarding their plans.

H. L. Hughes, San Diego, Cal., has just completed a handsome theater called The Flag, and which is devoted exclusively to motion pictures. One peculiarity about the house is the introduction of the water screen. The method used is adapted from the French theaters, the curtain being constructed of sheet iron and given six or eight coats of white enamel. A pipe runs across the top of the screen and throws the water from numerous small perforations across the entire top of the curtain making a thin screen of running water upon which the picture is thrown. Mr. Hughes claims that this takes out all flicker that is not eliminated by the machine, thus producing a picture of exceptional merit; the reflection is also said to equal if not surpass for practical purposes the popular mirror screen. A Power's No. 6 is used in The Flag. For a year prior to opening The Flag Mr. Hughes toured Europe in search of information on motion pictures and has promised to spring some other surprises soon.

Some Eastern men long identified with burlesque houses recently engaged me as their representative here and they contemplate erecting a string of houses in Southern California which will be devoted entirely to moving pictures and specialty songs and featuring high class orchestras in each house. We now have under option five locations and the work of building will be commenced as soon as arrangements can be completed. Riverside, Ontario, Pomona, Redlands and San Bernardino are the locations chosen and in most of the towns new houses will be erected especially for moving picture theaters, none to cost less than $15,000 and each to be fitted out in a very attractive manner.

The Pacific States Film Exchange has been consolidated with the Western Film Exchange, which brings the Independent situation here into the hands of Hyman & Brackett, who control the Western Film Exchange. They are making great headway for a young concern and are displaying a wonderful knowledge of the rules of the "Success Club," having practically forced their competitors into consolidation.

Clune's Broadway opened Monday night, the 10th, to a packed house. They are featuring a 14-piece orchestra and chimes. This is the best planned picture theater in California and probably is not excelled in the United States. Four machines and two stereos are installed and the operating room is said to be the most complete and up-to-date in the city.

Pasadena, Cal., now has an official censor in the person of the town marshal. Just what practical knowledge this "fly cop" has regarding motion pictures I do not happen to be informed, but he is not allowing the houses to show drama, only comic and scenic can be used.

Trusting that these few items will interest you, I am,

Very truly yours,

C. W. CULPEPPER.

LOST BISON COMPANY TURNS UP.

Fred J. Balshofer, the Western manager and producer of the Bison films informs us that the "lost" Bison Company has turned up, himself included. After struggling through underbrush and without water for twenty-four hours they reached civilization. Mr. Balshofer says that they are all back in Los Angeles none the worse for their trying experience and that they secured some rare and beautiful scenery which will shortly be seen in Bison films.

"The Ship's Husband" (Edison).—A comedy which is based upon that little known figure, a ship's husband, the one who has charge of her in port. Not knowing this, one woman succeeds in piling up a series of mistakes that involve two couples, making each couple appear like elopers. Eventually, however, the difficulties are amicably adjusted and the supposed eloping couples are re-united and they all find out what a ship's husband is. Lively enough, but with no special feature to commend it beyond its pleasantry.

"For a Woman's Honor" (Kalem).—A story of old Virginia in the period before the War, rather melodramatic in its tendencies, but better than some melodramas put out by this company. The hero maintains his silence regarding his whereabouts on a particular night, even to the shadow of the gallows. But finally the girl tells and he is exonerated, and the lovers are permitted to marry. The story is plausible and the interest is maintained through a chain of events that lead up to the denouement. The audience was visibly pleased with the production.

"A Mexican Legend" (Pathe).—Picturesque settings do much to rescue this film from oblivion. To see a figure purporting to be Christ appear three or four times is taking liberties with the most sacred tenets of a very large proportion of the people. The mixture of marauding and more or less drunken Indians is incongruous and unpleasant. Perhaps Indians did raid monasteries in Mexico, but even if they did there is no excuse for reproducing one of these raids in motion pictures. Scenically the film is attractive. Otherwise it is, well, another of the usual thing.

"Secret of the Cellar" (Urban-Eclipse).—A poor soldier, blinded by the same shell that kills his commander, succeeds, after undergoing many hardships, in reaching the officer's family and reveals to them a secret which saves them from the machinations of an imposter. Interest will center in the figure of the poor, blinded soldier, laboriously making his way homeward to protect the menaced family. There is little else to commend it.

"A Trip Through Scotland" (Urban-Eclipse).—Like all of Urban's outdoor pictures, an excellent piece of work. Some of the picturesque features of Edinburgh are reproduced, and there is one view in the Hebrides. Technically attractive and well worked out the picture presents a series of scenic attractions well worth seeing.

"Simple Charity" (Biograph).—Not a pleasant picture, but relieved by one charitable act that is simple, but dramatic, in its human appeal. The sufferings of the unfortunate old couple are reproductions of what is unfortunately too common. The unassuming charity of the working girl is the principal point of interest and the love of the young doctor follows naturally. The criticism of the charitable organizations is not in good taste, and, judged by what they actually accomplish, is not warranted.

"The Mystery of the Torn Note" (Lubin).—A comedy based upon a note in which a rejected suitor declares he is going to drown, and there the note is torn. Then comes a search, amid all sorts of excitement. After everything is turned topsy-turvy they go to the missing man's house, where they find him safe. The girl has had her lesson and accepts him offhand. The excited scramble of the police, headed by the girl, supplies some scenes of an amusing nature, but aside from that it is not up to the Lubin standard.

"A Gambler's Charm" (Lubin).—When considered from the standpoint of presenting a type that is fast passing away this film is interesting. Comparatively few ever knew or even saw the old type of Western gambler, and perhaps for that reason this picture may be thought attractive. Human types with which the audience are unfamiliar will arouse interest, but the story, based upon giving a good luck charm to a child and having it staked in a game by the child's father, has no special attraction. The gambler himself is the only interesting feature in the film.

"A Mountain Wife" (Melies).—Melodrama possesses the merit of presenting red-blooded personages at least. And the exploits of the wife in protecting her moonshining husband from the revenue officers in this picture keep the audience up to a high pitch of enthusiasm. The average audience delights in these melodramatic poses and the impossible situations from which the woman extricates herself and her husband with equal facility. One scene is worthy of commendation—the last one, where they leave the mountains for a new home. But wouldn't this have been better if it had been managed so the officers permitted the change? As it stands now one has a feeling that they will follow the fugitives, even though both have determined to go elsewhere and begin a new life.

"The Vampire" (Selig).—An attempt to put into pictorial form Sir Edwin Burne-Jones' picture and Rudyard Kipling's poem. Perhaps the attempt is successful in that it will be understood by those familiar with the picture and the poem. But what about those who are unfamiliar with them? Several near the writer were heard to ask what it all meant, and the probability is strong that many others are in much the same position. It is artistic, it is beautiful in the literary quality it possesses, but it is scarcely plain enough to be understood by the average person in an audience. In other words, the producer failed to convey the sentiment of the poem, however well it was staged and acted.

"The Adoption" (Edison).—A story of a child laid among the rough scenes of the mining country, and apart from its interest in developing the character of the miner, is also well acted by the four-year-old baby who plays the part of the child. It is a simple story, dramatic because of its simplicity, and filled with the heart touches which develop even in the roughest surroundings. Stories of children are always interesting, and this is no exception. The fortunes of the child and his pup, through their vicissitudes, are followed with the closest attention by the audience.

"The Attack on Fort Ridgely" (Kalem).—Fort Ridgely was in Minnesota and this picture represents substantially what occurred during an unexpected uprising of the Sioux Indians. Indian attacks have a certain similarity, but sometimes, as in this instance, the defence is more interesting than the attack. The film is really the story of this attack and the defence put upon the curtain.

"A Black Heart" (Pathe).—A story of a criminal whose career was cut short by his capture and trial by masked judges. Shooting arrows with files attached to them into prisons may be possible in foreign countries, but in America that scene has no point. Moreover, it contains a suggestion which may not be altogether desirable.

"Dutch Types" (Pathe).—Figures and landscapes in Holland, colored like the originals. The Dutch landscapes and the Dutch characters are always picturesque and this film is no exception to the general rule.

"Nine of Diamonds" (Vitagraph).—A story of a torn card, given to a man in California and turning up later in Civil War times and saving the life of the son of the man who gave it.

"The Marked Trail" (Essanay).—A wild Western picture with bandits, a kidnapped girl, a blindfolded doctor to attend her, and a very sensational rescue which ends in the capture of the entire gang. The novelty is in the blindfolded doctor scattering pills along the path to serve as a guide in returning. The scenic effects are striking and the audience seems to like the entire picture.

"Nebuchadnezzar's Pride" (Gaumont).—A reproduction of the Bible story of the King of Babylon and the three Hebrews in the fiery furnace. The picture follows the narrative closely and affords a fair view of what may be assumed the surroundings were.

"A Woman's Wit" (Gaumont).—Tells the story of a woman who objected to a bachelor friend marrying another and succeeds in making him appear so ridiculous that the other woman refuses to have anything to do with him.

"Jean Goes Fishing" (Vitagraph).—A pretty story of a dog that performs many remarkable stunts, two children and their widowed father and lone mother. The dog catches fish, rescues first a doll and then the children from the water, and judging from the last scene, is an important factor in a love match. The dog is an attractive feature, and cannot fail to please any audience.

"AT THE SIGN OF THE FLYING A"

Five Reasons Why You Should Ask Your Exchange to Book You AMERICAN FILM

I. All film released by this company is perfect in conception—perfect in production—perfect in photography—perfect in development—and perfect in the final inspection or it is not released. You are sure of GOOD PICTURES.

II. All stories told by this company in pictures are clean and wholesome. Are American. Are snappy, breezy or intense as the subject warrants.

III. All of our pictures are absolutely original in every thing that the name implies—no rehashing of subjects you have seen before—no makeshift or makebelieve—we deliver the goods and they are GOOD GOODS.

IV. Our posters are the very best that money can buy. Five colors. Attractive. They will get the people in your show. Our film will keep them there.

V. We know our business. We know how to make good film. We have made them for years. "The Gambler's End" (Pathe).—Too much bloodshed and too much suggestion of a rough, outlaw sort of life. Gambling and murders are all sensational, and perhaps in ordinary occasions may be tolerated. But this man's cruel deceit and desertion of his wife might better be suggested than shown, and the last scene, where the gambler falls dead before the bullets of the posse, would be improved by allowing the posse to lead him away to execution. Western justice at one time countenanced scenes of that character, but it does so no longer, and manufacturers should recognize this fact. The effect upon the legal status of the wife would be the same as it is now to have him fall dead. It is too much of a shock to have him go from the arms of his child to instant death at the hands of the avenging posse. These defects could be remedied as suggested and the film would be greatly improved in dramatic value. Bald presentation of repulsive scenes is crude and it should be the aim of the producer to suggest them. The yellow back type of story has no place in the picture drama. It may be answered that the idea is to show that a gambler's end is destruction, but the most impressive feature of a story like this is to see the criminal led away subject to the law.

"Into the Jaws of Death" (Edison).—A picture of the bravery of a fireman, interwoven with a love tale which carries the necessary heart interest. The thrilling rescue is realistic and is exactly what many in cities have seen numerous times. The interest is increased when it becomes apparent that the fireman has rescued the woman he loved. The technical quality of the picture is satisfactory and the tribute it pays to the bravery of firemen is deserved. They are not, as a rule, overburdened with praise and eloquent testimony of this character is, perhaps, all the more welcome.

"The Way of Life" (Kalem).—If one were to judge by this picture, life is full of disappointments and unpleasant features. Here is a man whose wife leaves him, which causes him no serious mourning, but when he goes in search of a girl with whom he discovered he was falling in love he finds she is married to a friend. That is, of course, a very unpleasant discovery indeed, but, the facts being irrevocable he must, perforce, submit, which he does with all the grace possible. The producer managed to build some really good dramatic situations around a very commonplace story.

"Love Laughs at Locksmiths" (Pathe).—A story of two lovers who are forced to perform a number of more or less humorous stunts in an effort to get married against the will of the girl's father. They succeed, but the ceremony is performed in a boat, while the objecting father stamps and rages upon the shore, helpless to prevent it. Just where the joke against locksmiths comes in is not so apparent.

"Russian Wolf Hunt" (Pathe).—A picture of snowy woodlands, and unbroken wastes of cold and snow, with hounds and hunters eager for the fray with the wild wolves of the Russian steppes. It is a triumph for the operator, and gives a reasonably accurate impression of what takes place during one of these hunts.

"The Rival Barons" (Urban-Eclipse).—A story of the Middle Ages when swashbuckling barons stole women whenever they chose and carried them away to be prisoners in their castles. If this robber received his deserts he got no more than he deserved. Costuming and accessories are interesting since they convey information regarding those days. But it can hardly be said that the audience was in sympathy with this type of picture.

"An Alpine Retreat: Gersaw and the Lake of Uri, Switzerland" (Urban-Eclipse).—A good outdoor picture, presenting an unusually attractive panorama of mountain and lake scenery. The audience was visibly pleased, and well they might be. It was a good film.

"Sunshine Sue" (Biograph).—A repetition of the oft-told tale of the girl decoyed from home by the city young man. This ends differently in the welcome home of the deceived young woman by her father and her lover. While the story has nothing new to offer, being as old as motion pictures, it is interesting because it appeals to the heart and perhaps calls to mind a similar instance in the experience of the individuals in the audience.

"The Street Preacher" (Lubin).—The story of a girl who spurned a young man because he decided to be a street preacher, but deceived by a man who professed to love her, she ultimately finds reason for blessing the same missionary. The film presents little that is new, excepting in so far as different actors interpret a story differently.

"A Shadow of the Past" (Pathe).—The film is commonplace, excepting the last act, where the released convict returns to denounce the woman whose conduct early in life made him a criminal. The dramatic recital of his sufferings during thirty years results in the woman's death, so vivid does he make it.

"Mr. Four Flush" (Selig).—A comedy representing a man regaling his club friends with vivid stories of his experience in globe trotting when in reality he had been reducing huge stones to small pieces in the county jail. His perfidy is discovered and his club friends make him suffer for it.

INDEPENDENT.

"The King of the Beggars" (Atlas).—A travesty upon the organization of trusts. The possibilities of a story of this character are admirably worked out. Securing his fortune, the beggar king disappears just as the police descend upon the haunts of the gang. Eventually, however, he is discovered and the officers are sent for him, but providentially he drops dead just as they are about to arrest him. It is not a great story, but, like all features of this character, it is interesting, and the novelty of the theme helps to hold the attention of the audience. It has no particular dramatic strength, but is just a novel story, plainly told, illustrating how a dual life, even of the most opposite character, is possible.

"The Ranchman and the Miser" (Champion).—A Western picture, introducing features which are new to films depicting the West. The incident of the stolen brooch, with the fastening of the suspicion upon the girl's lover, affords opportunity for good acting. It is a strong dramatic point to have the miser drop dead just before he reveals his secret, with the brooch in his hand. It is a relief which is duly appreciated. The audience were worked up to a high pitch of emotional interest, but that solution immediately solves what was coming to be a troublesome problem. The actors perform their parts with sympathy and spirit and there is no question about the intense interest of all who see it.

"The Woodsman" (Nestor).—A domestic drama of more than average merit. A young wife and an old husband. Probably little harmony of thought or action. She tires of him and longs for companionship more to her liking, and the young man accidentally hurt by her husband supplies it. The old man's awakening is terrible. Dramatically it is one of the strongest scenes of the week. The old man plods away, leaving the cabin far behind. The officers take the young man away, and the young wife, thoughtless, perhaps, in her sinning, is left alone, wondering why her husband does not return. But he plods on through the forest, going he knows not where. The imagination is strongly stimulated by this picture, so simple in its settings and telling a story common enough to lack novelty. But whether the audience will or no, before the film closes they find themselves almost tense with the strength of their emotions. It is an old story, told with ability and sympathy, and presented with adequate mechanical effects.

"The Last Straw" (Defender).—The adventures of a country youth, innocently led into the toils of a counterfeiter and imprisoned without reason. Escaping and beginning anew, success comes to him and ultimately the country sweetheart is sent for. Then one of those responsible for his original conviction appears and again and again demands hush money. At last, goaded beyond endurance, the young man commits his first crime by killing the worthless hangeron. Not much dramatic opportunity, it is true, but one of those simple tales that somehow touches the sympathies and makes everybody want to befriend the young man unintentionally entangled in the meshes of fate. The photographer did his part well and the dark-room man equally so in regard to the mechanical part of the work.

"The Model's Redemption" (Imp).—A picture that holds the audience closely to the end. Perhaps it is the change in the beautiful model; perhaps it is in the sharp contrast between the gay Bohemian life of the rich and successful artist and the hopelessness of the one who had genius, but was beset with misfortune. Whatever it may be, the attraction is there, and the emotions are deeply moved as the beautiful model, fulfilling her promise to pose for the poor artist, comes to understand the spirituality of his nature and her own responds to it. But it is too late. Starvation has done its work. He dies just as he finishes a picture which is a masterpiece. Acted with sympathy which seizes upon the dramatic possibilities of the subject, and photographed with skill, this picture appeals strongly to the emotions of the audience and the sympathy for him is outspoken. After his death the same sympathy is extended to the model, who, realizing the worthlessness of the life she has been living, renounces it and enters a convent. The Imp Company has produced a picture which cannot fail to interest.

"The Truth Revealed" (Lux).—A country love match, nearly broken up by a jealous rival, flows on as smoothly as ever after a photograph proves to the young man that he has been bled to. The way these things happen in stories and judgments are formed without investigation or permitting an explanation, is quite different from such occurrences in real life. But a disturbed love story with a little jealousy intermixed is generally popular with most audiences, and this one will prove no exception to the rule.

"Bill as a Boxer" (Lux).—A comedy of the vigorous type, representing what befalls Bill when he begins practicing for boxing to win a reward. When all those with whom he comes in contact finish with him he is in no condition to win prizes.

"A Widow and Her Child" (Solax).—A tale of a widow with a child and two suitors. One, when the widow favors the suit of the other, kidnaps the child and forces the mother to promise to marry him to get it back. But just before this nefarious bit of work can be accomplished the rival finds the child, stops the wedding and marries the mother himself. With forceful acting, which at times reaches dramatic heights, this story is really more interesting than it sounds in the retelling. The personality of the actors and good photography combine to give it interest.

"Bud's Triumph" (Bison).—A lively drama which recalls the days when this house began to put out their Western films, and they were good, representing the region and its life as they had not previously been interpreted in photoplays. The character of Bud in this one will attract and the entire play, emphasized by good photography, seems to please the audience.

"The Heroine of 101 Ranch" (Columbia).—The first of this company's ranch productions has claims for consideration which deserve attention. The picturesque life of the West, when properly depicted, is dramatic. In truth, all life is dramatic, but the development in the West under new and peculiar conditions was even more dramatic than in the older portions of the country. The actors in this photoplay have caught that spirit and have reproduced the life so naturally that all effort to obtain effect has disappeared. The characters and the scenes are re-enacted before the audience. There is life, with plenty of exciting situations and a denouement which supplies a sufficiently interesting climax to close the film. The audience watched it with satisfaction and applauded vigorously at the close.

"World's Wrestling Champions" (Great Northern).—A picture showing a number of the great wrestlers of the world at work. Among them is Lurich, the leader of them all. To be able to show so many of the leaders in one film is an achievement which should go far to fill the theater. The average audience likes this kind of a film, and here is one of the best that has come out in some time.

"Mother-in-Law Arrives" (Great Northern).—Fabian learns that his mother-in-law is coming and endeavors to devise means for divesting himself of her presence. But his hoodoo is busy and the result is a series of comical situations in which Fabian is worsted, and mamma-in-law stays. A laughing picture that kept a New York audience roaring. That is the exact word—roaring.

"Foolshead Knows All" (Itala).—This popular comedian appears as the possessor of superior knowledge, and the difficulties he encounters supply a series of very comical situations. This comedian is a favorite who never fails to amuse an audience. No theater will have cause to regret the visit of Foolshead.

"The Ordeal" (Powers).—A dramatic subject which is acted with sympathy and the story is developed naturally and in a convincing manner. The mechanical part of the work is well done, the photography being clear and the staging in keeping with the subject. The audience was visibly impressed with the picture in one New York theater.

"Romantic Redskins" (American).—An Indian comedy drama with many humorous situations. It keeps the audience in good humor from beginning to end, and at the same time discloses some characteristic traits of Indian character. The acting is clear-cut and sympathetic, and the photographer has done his part well in addition. The audience did not hesitate to express its approval of the film very vigorously, where the writer saw it, which should be encouraging to this new concern.

"Ginhara, or Faithful Unto Death" (Eclair).—This picture in staging takes the audience back to Thebes, but it presents a very human story. The daughter of the King of Thebes shows her spirit in a way that proved acceptable to the audience. It seems rather hard that a woman of so much spirit should make way with herself, but that was the way of the ancient world, and she did no more than others under the same circumstances. That she showed a proper spirit in avenging her husband will be admitted. While an audience may not wish to condone murder, it is recognized that this woman had more than the usual provocation to kill, and if she did, the average audience will commend her. The picture is acted with spirit and the dramatic situations are developed to their full value. Twice the writer saw it, in widely varying localities, and in both instances the audience received it with enthusiasm.

"The Devil's Billiard Table" (Eclair).—A sort of reminder of Faust, in that the players are promised assistance if they will give their souls to the Devil. This is promised, and when the expert billiardist begins playing with his new antagonist he learns many things about the game he never suspected and goes down in defeat.

"The Case of the Missing Heir" (Yankee).—A detective story in which Nell appears again to advantage, running down the kidnappers of a child whose death would involve a large estate. The miscreants are brought to justice after numerous hair-raising but interesting experiences on the part of the young woman. The Yankee Company has carried the development of the detective story to a high state of perfection and their pictures never fail to interest.

"How Women Love" (Powers).—A picture presenting a somewhat mixed love tale in which an unworthy young man is loved by a girl who resorts to stern measures finally in an effort to win him. There is much flirtation, an accidental shooting which is wrongfully charged to another, but eventually the girl succeeds in securing her recalcitrant lover and all goes well. The mixed situations afford ample interest for the audience, who display considerable animation in endeavoring to unravel the mystery.

"That Woman Lawyer" (Powers).—A comedy which represents a number of miners fleeced by a pretty woman lawyer whom they had made their banker. Of course she didn't want to do it, but the fact that she needed the money was sufficient cause for decamping, leaving only an empty safe behind. The woebegone expression of the miners when they discover their loss is as funny as anything seen in a long time. Even the note, explaining how badly she needed the money, is insufficient to lift the look of the weight of woe from their countenances.

"Paul and Virginia" (Thanhouser).—If the author who wrote this popular classic had done his work with photoplay reproduction in prospect he couldn't have done better. A classic tale, it makes a picture destined to be quite as popular as the story itself. There is no use in repeating the story. Everybody who has read at all knows the story of Paul and Virginia. If, perchance, there be a few in the audience who have never read it, the film will make it clear. Every scene is interesting, from the time when Paul and Virginia are disclosed as children until Virginia, disowned by her wealthy aunt, sails to meet Paul again and drowns in sight of land, the picture holds the attention, even as the story holds it. The producer has performed his part with thorough knowledge of the requirements and has worked out the problems with sympathy. The picture is clear, and whoso sees it will mourn with Paul over the dead Virginia. The emotions will be deeply stirred by the direct and simple story, founded upon a basis of love.

"THE NEW MAGDALEN."

A Powers Contender for First Honors.

Through the error of our advertising man, or the Powers advertising man, or both, or the printer, the above title appeared in our advertising columns last week as "The Magdalen" instead of "The New Magdalen." As everyone connected with the unfortunate affair is inclined to dodge the responsibility, and shove the blame onto someone else, there remains only the one logical culprit, and that is the printer. Providence will heap its final reward upon the heads of all printers, good or bad, according to their deserts. At the present writing our printer stands one step further away from heaven than he did at this time last week.

The difference between "The Magdalen" and "The New Magdalen," is all the difference in the world, because the former would naturally imply the well-known Bible story of Mary Magdalen, while "The New Magdalen" refers specifically to the famous novel of that name, written by Wilkie Collins. It is only natural, then, that Mr. Golden, the Powers producer, should take it to heart when this mistake was made, because he is a great admirer of Wilkie Collins, and because he has been occupied for the better part of a year in bringing this well-known work to a final dramatization.

Mr. Golden considers "The New Magdalen" as his masterpiece, and is willing to stand or fall by it. For many months he has studied the work from every angle, and has spared himself no pains in working it out in the minutest details. It is his idea of a finished picture play. He has taken his time and left no stone unturned to make this film a representative sample, in the true sense of the word.

Mr. Golden is an ardent exponent of the subtle and suggestive style of acting, as opposed to the use of shoulders, arms, legs, etc., to express what is in the mind. One can observe in a very few moments that this producer is aiming at the high results to be obtained by facial expression. He seems to know the value of reserve force and suppressed emotion. There are, as everybody knows, two natural schools of pantomime. One might be properly styled the Latin school, which encourages the use of the whole body in expression. The other could be termed the Saxon, or English school, which relies on facial expression alone, and which can express great grief without pulling out bunches of hair. The question will perhaps never be settled as to which is the best. One thing is true, however: the American people are beginning to tire of the Latin school and are turning to their own when they wish to be entertained in the fullest measure.

In working out a picture play along the American idea, it is absolutely necessary for the producer to be absolute master of the situation at all times. It is necessary for the producer and actors to understand each other thoroughly. This is apparent in the work of "The New Magdalen." The director has his company thoroughly educated and in tune with himself. It is evident that they follow his directions to the letter. In other words, he does the thinking, and they do the work. Therefore with him should rest the blame if the pictures fail, and to him should go the credit when they succeed.

It is not the purpose of this review to follow the scenes in detail; the literal synopsis will be found elsewhere in this issue. We prefer to treat the matter a little more broadly when it is evident that a producer is working along certain definite lines. The picture is essentially a studio picture, with only one or two outdoor scenes. The photography is as clear and bright as a good lens and proper light can make it. (Incidentally it might be remarked that if the manufacturers expect to have their films reviewed under the best of circumstances, they should get after the Sales Company and cause them to furnish better projection. An exhibition with bad focus and poor light is no way for a maker to be showing off his goods.)

The acting in "The New Magdalen" is consistent throughout. By the mere power of suggestion it carries the interest evenly, right up to the climax. It is at the climax, just before the confession, that we get the best example of the American idea, when the suspense is brought to a high point of tension. Though she stands rigid and motionless, it is easy to read in the face of Mary Merrick that she is torn with internal emotion. She stands at a great divide; at a point where she must give up all that life holds dear, or do a great wrong to another. The director is to be congratulated upon the great amount of sustained interest he has obtained all through the piece, but especially at this one point.

The Powers leading lady, Miss Pearl White, is naturally adapted for the part of Mary Merrick. She is extremely pretty; almost too pretty, we thought, when she appeared in rags in the first scene. It may have made a better contrast with her later grace and charm had she appeared at first a little more emaciated. To Miss White, however, does not belong all the credit of good work. While she is the leading note in the symphony, the other actors are the notes that swell it into a full and complete harmony. They are right behind her all the time, and while their work may seem to be secondary to hers, they have as much to do with the working up of that big scene as she. The setting for the climax is elaborate to the extreme. It is nip and tuck between the work in the characters of Mary Merrick and Grace Roseberry. It is hard to tell which of the ladies did the better. The sub-dominant parts of Julian Gray and Lady Roy were exceptionally well handled. Mr. Golden has the right idea, and while he is working it out along his own original lines, we hope to have the privilege of applaud ing many more such efforts as "The New Magdalen."

Kansas City, Mo.—An eight-page monthly bulletin giving a short synopsis of the pictures and program for the month is a good suggestion just put into effect by S. M. Major, manager of the Illiad Theater in this city. By distributing the bulletin among its patrons they are able to follow the pictures more intelligently and consequently with greater interest, and also to see what the program will be for the coming weeks.

A REMARKABLE FILM.

"The Necklace of the Dead" (Great Northern).—A dramatic subject of considerable power, admirably interpreted by artists of the Royal Theater, Copenhagen. A girl is given a present of a necklace by her lover. She becomes an invalid, and at length the doctors give up hope and the girl passes away. She is placed in her coffin, and the young man comes in to take a last farewell of his beloved. He places a bunch of flowers on the pall, and encircles the dead girl's neck with the jewelry he has given her. Later, the undertaker's man comes to perform the last sad office; the man is poor, and the sight of the necklace recalls to his mind the poverty of his home. He argues with himself that it is a sin to bury in the ground what will be useful to others, and he resolves to take the necklace. Accordingly he goes during the night to the vault where she is entombed, unscrews the coffin, and removes the shroud. Horrors! he feels a movement and comes to the conclusion that the girl was buried alive! He goes to her lover, confesses all, and the two hasten to the vault. Meanwhile, the girl has really regained consciousness, and panic-stricken with horror gets out of her coffin. When her lover arrives he finds her senseless with terror at her grim surroundings, but in his arms she recovers. Learning the undertaker's story, she gives him the necklace, the desire for which led to her preservation from a living grave. The man, however, feels that the only thing to be done in view of the circumstances is to devote the gift to the service of the church, and this he does. A gruesome but gripping story well portrayed.

THE WARWICK COMPANY IN THE UNITED STATES.

This week we have had a visit from A. E. Mainwaring, a representative of the Warwick Trading Company, Ltd., which, we may say, is one of the oldest firms in the business. We remember its establishment in Warwick Court, London, some ten or twelve years ago. Now it occupies very large premises in the center of London, and does an enormous business in the production of topicals: that is to say, moving pictures illustrative of the day's happenings, of which the British public is very fond. But then, as we have pointed out before, Britain is such a small place that it is an easy matter to photograph a topical, develop it and show it in the theater at night. In this country, where, let us say, a fight occurs at Reno, Nev., at least six days are necessary before that picture can be shown in New York City. And then, of course, interest in that fight has been discounted by the newspapers.

Mr. Mainwaring's business here is mainly in connection with the Cinephone, in which the Warwick Company is interested. We understand that the Cinephone is to be put on the American market under new auspices by a well capitalized company. So far this ingenious adjunct to the moving picture has not had, through fortuitous circumstances, a fair show on the American market. We are informed now that all difficulties are overcome and that in the future everything will be plain sailing. We are very glad to know this, as we have always been of opinion that in its own field the Cinephone has a great chance of success.

We might mention in passing that there is a probability of the Warwick Company coming into the United States to make pictures. There is no reason why they should not. They have ample capital at command, the necessary technical knowledge, and they certainly understand the business. Considering the enormous size of the United States and Canada and the territories of South America and other countries in this hemisphere, there should be plenty of room for new, good manufacturers. It is commonly said that the moving picture is in its infancy. We certainly think that many of the manufacturers at present in the business don't realize the possibilities of the picture—they do not give the public what the public is prepared to receive: that is, plenty of pictures, and above all things, plenty of good pictures.

The very evident superiority of the Mirror Screen for giving the best effects in picture projection is steadily resulting in increased orders wherever it is demonstrated. Orders have just been placed for two of the largest Mirror Screens ever sold, both going to Atlantic City, N. J. One screen is for the large Elite Theater of Messrs. Brown & Savage, on Atlantic avenue, and the other will be installed at Young's Million Dollar Pier. An order has also been placed this week for a large Mirror Screen by Harry Davis, Milton, Pa.

"A DIXIE MOTHER."

A Remarkable Life Portrayal. Is it to be The Photoplay of the Year?

Dame Rumor informed us that a photoplay had been lately produced by the Vitagraph Company which all who had seen it referred to as the best and strongest play of the year. As this is a lofty term to apply to a photoplay which had not yet been submitted to that inexorable censor, the public, a World reviewer begged for a private view which was graciously accorded.

Whether "A Dixie Mother" will live up to advance opinion it deserves to be called great. It will easily take a high position among dramas of the year because of its many fine qualities, and it deserves praise because plays of that sort answer captious criticism, and many like them would do away with censorship altogether. The fact that it is evenly balanced in the requisites of success makes it difficult to say whether it excels in inspiration, in acting or in scenic effect, but it may safely be pronounced eminent in each respect.

Very few dramatists and still fewer novelists have successfully depicted the American woman as she really is. She is so complex that she evades analysis. In "A Dixie Mother," however, she is a pure type. It would be difficult to name a nobler type of American woman than the Southern wife and mother during the Civil War. Northern mothers made equally noble sacrifices during the war, but, after it was all over, the sad burden of defeat fell on the shoulders of her Southern sister. The sentiment of the picture hovers around this beautiful central figure and is clearly shown in nearly every one of the many stirring and affecting scenes, scenes true to life.

"A Dixie Mother" is strong as a character portrayal. The central character is not a forced one. Only once does the enraged mother show a strain of tigerish ferocity, when she picks out the man who killed her youngest son almost before her eyes. The rest of the portrayal is one of fortitude, great courage under affliction, deprivation and danger. Her eldest son is wounded and taken prisoner, her despairing husband is also terribly wounded, she has a helpless household on her hands, but she neither fails nor falters.

After the war is over, the Dixie mother is a gentle creature and shows another kind of fortitude in the patient way that she confronts hardship and privation. There is no change in her enduring affection for her family, but her husband refuses to become reconciled to a union of the North and the South that has produced a new generation. The new generation is typified by her eldest son's baby waving the old flag. Heartbroken over this after-hatred, the mother begs and entreats in vain. Then her proud spirit breaks at last. She is on the verge of mental dissolution and death when her irreconcilable husband relents. When he does yield, it is by no half measures. He surrenders to the new generation with such old-time chivalry that we smile through our tears.

"The Dixie Mother" is a master stroke of genius. This kind of a picture will be far reaching in its influence and a popular one for the South and of especial interest to the whole country. We are not alone in these opinions and inform the trade that they may not miss this wonderful "Life Portrayal."

SPECIAL RELEASES.

The exhibitor of moving pictures pays a flat rate for his service each week, regardless of what films are produced by the manufacturers. In other words, he takes them as they come, good ones and poor ones. Therefore, why should he be forced to pay a good premium for the use of special releases? Exhibitors on the licensed side of the fence should receive them as part of their regular routine, because of their payment of the $2 weekly—being a part of that organization should put them in line to receive whatever extras the Patents Company may secure by virtue of its power and affluence. Exhibitors of Independent films should receive them gratis, because of the fact that they are willing to ally themselves with the weaker party; if the reason stated above is not sufficient in itself. It may be stated in opposition to this argument that special films cost the manufacturers an unusual outlay of money in order to receive the right to photograph the subject. Quite true; but no scenery or actors are used in these films, and this fact evens up the unusual outlay mentioned above. If exhiitors were given a rebate when using an inferior film, the idea of extra charge on specials would be fair, but as things are now run between exhibitors and their exchanges, it seems rather one-sided. We understand the fact that the manufacturer charges the exchange a premium on these specials, and this is the root of the evil. These films should be released without additional charge to either party, in the regular routine way. Then, again, it is well known that the stockholders in corporations doing an excellent business—as it is well known the film manufacturers are doing—receive, now and then, extra disbursements in the form of additional dividends, etc., which are termed "melons" or "plums." Therefore, why should not the exhibitors, who are really stockholders in these film companies as much as they are absolutely necessary to the former's business, receive a little melon once in a while, in the nature of "regular special releases"? Someone please answer. It may be of interest to note that exhibitors in the New England States are becomin rather annoyed by the special release idea.

THEATRICAL ACTIVITY IN BROOKLYN.

Recently there has been quite some activity in the demolition of buildings on the northerly side of Flatbush avenue, between Linden and Park View avenues, Brooklyn. The cause for the demolition has come to light from the contents of a lease which has been filed in the office of the Register of Kings County. From this instrument it is learned that there is to be erected on this site a theater, which will cover an area of 70 by 130 feet. The theater is being constructed by G. H. Schwartz, owner of the Washington Photoplay Theater, 344 Fifth avenue, Brooklyn, and operated by the Carlton Amusement Company, G. H. Schwartz president, and will have a capacity of one thousand, with a cost of $75,000.

Although the nature of the entertainments has not yet been determined upon, it is, however, within the contemplation of the proprietors to give motion pictures and refined vaudeville performances at moderate prices. At least two more months will be consumed for the completion of this building, which will be of fireproof construction and will contain all modern conveniences.

WHO IS THE BEST ADVERTISER?

The Yankee Film Company wants to know who will make the best and most thorough showing on the advertising of their first Friday release, "Queen of the Nihilists." They offer a prize of twenty-five dollars to the theater showing the best evidence of good advertising. Now, Mr. Exhibitor, get after that twenty-five. Even if you don't win, you're bound to increase your receipts and make them talk about your house more than ever; besides, you are boosting a film that is well worth featuring on any program, and every new face you bring to your house on account of extra advertising will mean a permanent patron gained, and that's worth while.

FORGER CAPTURED.

Chas. P. Raynor, alias Saunders, alias Ramsey, who hails from Cleveland, Ohio, was taken into custody Saturday by the Chicago police on a charge of forgery. He had passed bogus checks in St. Louis, Quincy, Decatur, Peoria, and other cities; among others he issued several signed Standard Film Company, per Joseph Hopp, President. He used the word Company instead of Exchange, and the forging of Mr. Hopp's signature was a very crude piece of work. A reward of $100 had been offered by Mr. Hopp for his apprehension, and the same was paid on Monday following his arrest. Raynor was taken to Peoria to stand trial.

BLUNDER IN THE MOVING PICTURES.

Salem Theater patrons thoroughly enjoy the motion picture portion of the daily performances there fully as much as the vaudeville, but when scenes supposed to be founded on local history are presented they are disposed to be critical, especially when the adaptations are ridiculous. This week's film is a dramatization of Hawthorne's "House of the Seven Gables," excellently done, but spoiled for Salem audiences by making the usual inexcusable blunder of burning at the stake a prisoner accused of witchcraft. This film is from the Edison Company, and whoever took the pains to design it ought to read up his history and acquire knowledge of the fact so many, many times proclaimed broadcast, that no one accused of witchcraft was ever burned in this city.—Salem (Mass.) News.

THE GNOME MOVING PICTURE COMPANY: ANOTHER INDEPENDENT MANUFACTURER.

Operating under the license of the Animated Picture Patents Company, the Gnome Moving Picture Company makes its first release on December 12, next. The Animated Picture Patents Company, we may explain, is a holding company; it holds several patents, one of them being the much discussed Meredith-Jones Camera, which is universally conceded to be of the non-infringing type. Here let us say that if one or two clever inventors would only get to work they could produce cameras which would render the Edison patent worthless. But to the Gnome Company: It has a factory at Park and Tremont avenues in the Bronx, New York City. It has organized a dramatic and technical staff. It has accumulated a number of negatives. It is well backed up financially, and, to our thinking, it has outlined a policy which makes for success.

That policy is to produce subjects which will appeal primarily, especially during the Winter season, to the children. We have seen specimen strips of the films that have so far been made. These are of good photographic quality, and are pretty and pleasing in sentiment. They deal with the lives, adventures and misadventures of gnomes and other inhabitants of fairyland. We think the Gnome Company has a bright career in front of it. Mr. Meredith-Jones, the moving spirit of the concern, is no novice in the moving picture field. He has years of experience and knowledge behind him, and therefore is exceptionally well equipped for the business. The Gnome Company is to produce comedies as well as children's subjects. We think the company a decided acquisition to the Independent ranks.

BUFFALO BILL PICTURES DRAW.

The owners of the State rights of the moving pictures of the Buffalo Bill Wild West and Pawnee Bill Far East report that these films are being exhibited to crowded houses at advanced prices of admission, and that return dates are being booked in almost every theater. Collins & Collins are drawing capacity business in New York State. P. G. Cameron has ordered another set of film in order to fill the bookings in Texas. J. Allen, mannger of the Canadian Film Exchange, Calgary, Alberta, which controls the rights for Western Canada, visited New York the past week and placed an order for a second set of film, which Mr. Allen states he requires to meet the demand for the film in his territory. Mr. Allen is receiving from $300 to $500 a week rental for the use of the Buffalo Bill and Pawnee Bill film, and has bookings three months ahead. The Anti-Trust Film Company of Chicago have the rights for Illinois and Wisconsin, and the Ohio rights are controlled by Louis Becht, proprietor of the Mall Theater, Cleveland. William Oppenheimer has bought the rights for Florida, Alabama, and Georgia. William Hoffman has the rights for Kentucky, while Albert Jackson has the rights for Oklahoma. William Morrison, Meadford, Ontario, has the Ontario rights, and a deal has just been closed with P. C. Bach at Montreal for Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. Many other deals are being closed. As Col. Cody is just completing his farewell tour, the pictures of the Wild West and Far East should hold interest for years and bear repeating many times in any theater.

J. H. Hallberg, inventor of the Hallberg Economizer, reports that he is just in receipt of a letter from the Star Amusement Company, Denver, Col., reading: "I purchased one of your 220-volt Economizers and it has paid for itself in just nine weeks. Now it is working for me at rate of $50 per month. Our light is fully as good as it was when I was running on direct current and used an old rheostat. Best wishes for your continued prosperity."

Letters to the Editors.

MEETING OF THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 14, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Will you please announce in your valuable paper that the Exhibitors' League of the State of Ohio will meet at the Southern Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, on the 5th day of December, 1910. Every moving picture exhibitor is invited to attend, not only in Ohio, but all over the United States. We expect a large attendance, and a free discussion. We wish the advice and co-operation of every moving picture Exhibitor, and we extend a cordial invitation to all, with the hope that other States will send delegates. We expect to soon form a national organization. Our League is growing very rapidly, and much good has already been done.

Very truly yours,
THE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE,
By M. A. NEFF, President.

FEATURE RELEASES.

La Grande, Ore., November 5, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I am an exhibitor in this great photoplay family, and have been for the past four years, owning several different houses, and since last March have had the Isis Theater in the above named town, and have been a constant reader of the World which I have been getting at one of the local news stands.

I firmly believe the columns of the World have done a wonderful work in this photoplay field, giving justice where it is due, and scoring faults where they exist, and I am taking the liberty of calling attention to a wrong, as it appeals to me. If it meets with your approval and is worthy of publication, please do so as I believe it will make a good many of the exhibitors think once or twice at least, and at the same time I do not wish to be classed as a pessimist.

I believe the exhibitors are the pulse of the photoplay business and they are entitled to a great deal of consideration, both by the manufacturers and the exchanges, and the point I wish to raise is simply this: We are charged a regular weekly rental for the use of the film, taking everything as it comes from our exchange, the good with the bad and the bad with the good, and we pay the same price for service at all times. Now, when some special feature comes out, the exchanges write us exhibitors that such a picture is just released, and if we want to run it for the benefit of our customers, we will have to name the dates that we want it and then bid for it, and if our bid is higher than the other fellow for those dates we get it and if not we do not. It seems to me that the manufacturer and the exchange should at all times give the exhibitor the best to be had and not be holding us up, so to speak, for a feature reel that the patrons of our houses wish to see. I trust you will publish this and help to right the wrong that now exists in this auction block policy.

With best wishes, I am,

Yours very truly,
BERT M. SHERWOOD.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In view of the fact that my name has been prominently linked with the alien operators' movement, I wish to take it on myself personally to discredit an attempt that is being made by another publication to foster the movement. It was the editor of that publication who discouraged the movement when we first went to him and went so far as to not only express his sentiment against it, but also attempted to prove how futile our fight would be. I would like you to know that we are still working on the matter and we have faith in your ability to win for us. It was through our efforts and yours that attention was called to the treaty by which the Italians dodged the amendment, but while they are taken care of there are a great number of Irish, French, Germans, Hebrews, etc., who are still depending on your efforts. It does seem unjust that this condition of affairs should exist, but we are resting in our assurance that the greatest progress possible will be made in a legal and systematic way.

Very truly yours,
SAMUEL SOLOMON.

NEW YORK PITTSBURG CHICAGO MILWAUKEE SAN FRANCISCO

BIOGRAPH.

HIS NEW LID.—The next time Jenks purchases a new hat he will have it screwed to his pate so that he and the hd will be absolutely inseparable, for his most recently procured Kelly cost him both money and trouble in abundance. On his way to his office one morning, he decides to get a new straw hat. With his head topped with this new crown he looks quite debonair. Lunch-time arriving, he goes to appease the cravings of his pneumogastric nerve, and here his trouble begins when an exchange of hats is made, someone taking his new sky-piece leaving in its stead a woolly creation of masculine millinery, with a surface like a bath mit. Towering with rage, he returns to his office, where he receives a telegram calling him out of town in a hurry on business. Despatching word to his wife he hustles off. Meanwhile, the purloiner of his lid, while walking along the seashore loses it overboard, and it is carried out to sea to be driven back on the shore by the returning tide, where it is picked up by a neighbor of Jenks, who finding the name and address on the band, takes it to whom he now assumes to be Widow Jenks—a most natural conclusion. Instanter the mourning of the dear departed (?) is precipitated. Fancy his surprise and their amazement when he returns. It is with difficulty he persuades all bands that he is material and not ethereal. The undertaker, however, is insistent and Jenks pays for a funeral he hadn't the chance of enjoying.

NOT SO BAD AS IT SEEMED.—Appearances are deceiving and circumstantial evidence should be taken with caution. In this Biograph subject the circumstances were apparently very compromising. Mr. and Mrs. Jones are about to start on a hurried trip. Mrs. Jones writes a note to her friend and neighbor, Mrs. Young, asking her to feed the bird every day during her absence. Mr. Jones writes to his friend, Mr. Hall, bidding him to enjoy the use of his library during the while. Mrs. Young is possessed of a jealous dispositioned hubby, while Mr. Hall's wifey is endowed with the like sensitiveness. Mrs. Young and Mr. Hall go to Jones' domicile each with their own mission in view, and each unknown to the other. Mr. Hall is in the library, while Mrs. Young is in the sitting room, when Hall knocks over a piece of bric-a-brac, frightening the wits out of Mrs. Young, who starts in alarm. Each reckon the other a hidden burglar, until they meet. At this point Mr. Young and Mrs. Hall appear simultaneously on the doorstep of the Jones' house. Aha! A deep-dyed plot. Things are threateningly tragic until the Joneses, whose auto becomes disabled, return. Explanations corroborating the couple's protestations bring peace.

THE SONG OF THE WILDWOOD FLUTE.—In the opening scene is shown the Corn Dance, which is a ceremonial performed in thanksgiving to the Great Master for his bountiful yield of crops. This dance is performed each year at the harvest. During the course of the dance, Dove Eyes, the pretty little squaw, becomes very much attracted by Gray Cloud, the brave who leads the dance. Gray Cloud is handsome and graceful, and it is small wonder that he should impress the pretty maid. Her interest in him does not go unnoticed for the brave has long been smitten with the little squaw and bashfully makes advances which are just as coyly received. To conclusively learn his fate, he goes to the old squaw to hire the love flute. This is the time-honored custom of lovers and is their form of wooing. This love flute is held in the custody of a spinster squaw and the swains hire it from her with the payment of skins to serenade the object of their affections. If the maid is enticed from the tepee by the strains of the flute, the lover is given hope. Dove Eyes appears and Gray Cloud wins his suit, and prepares for the marriage. Meanwhile, Gray Cloud's rival hires the flute to serenade Dove Eyes, but she turns a deaf ear, and so the rival goes away disgruntled and vowing vengeance. After the marriage Gray Cloud starts on a hunting trip. His rival follows at a distance determined to wreak revenge. Some distance away from the village the rival makes a move to shoot Gray Cloud, but desists, not having the cold blood to effect this purpose. He has hardly lowered the gun when he sees Gray Cloud disappear. The earth seems to have swallowed him, and it does in a measure, for when the rival runs to the spot, he finds Gray Cloud at the bottom of a bear pit. To get out unaided is impossible but his rival merely laughs derisively and leaves him to his fate. The little squaw has been pining all this while for Gray Cloud, who has now been absent for several days. Dragging herself to her father's tepee, she is taken ill on the very threshold and is carried inside. The medicine man is called, and after many prayers and incantations gives the case up. The rival hears the cries of the poor heartcrushed little squaw and all the animosity he held for Gray Cloud dissipates, so he runs to the pit and drags Gray Cloud out, helping him to Dove Eyes' side, who livens up as he is the real doctor of her ills.

ESSANAY FILM COMPANY.

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT.—The scene opens in a college fraternity house, where three or four young men students are gathered. Tom, our hero, is filling over a book, hopelessly bored, and praying for something to happen. Suddenly seizing the paper he notices a matrimonial ad. which offers inspiration for a practical joke. Jack seizes pen and paper and writes the following: "Young athletic man of good family desires to meet a woman. She must be dark and pretty. Object matrimony." Tom shows the advertisement to his chums, who all good-naturedly enter into the fun, and all leave to place the advertisement with the newspaper.

The following day Jane Williams, living in a neighboring town, reads the advertisement and decides to answer it. Laughingly she writes the note, takes up her photograph, then hesitates as she sees the photograph of her friend, Elinore Ainsley. With a mischievous smile, she decides to send Elinore's photograph instead of her own.

The next day Tom receives, among a dozen or more answers to his advertisement, Jane's letter and Elinore's photograph. Closely studying the pretty face, he finds his practical joke has taken a serious trend, for he is already captivated by the pretty counterfeit.

After two months' correspondence Jane receives Tom's photograph. Now she is conscience-stricken, as Tom has promised to spend his vacation in her town, and how will she explain her trick. Tom, she is convinced, is in love with Elinore's picture and not with her.

Shortly after Tom leaves the train at Oakdale and on his way to Jane's house sees Elinore and mistakes her for Jane. When he strides toward her with outstretched hand and a smiling face, Elinore is indignant, while Tom is mystified. Jane, coming on the scene makes matters worse when as Elinore is hurrying into the house, tries to explain that she is Jane. Elinore now sees through the trick, and, returning, takes Tom's arm and leads him off, while poor Jane is left alone in despair.

Matters, however, are finally settled when Tom is invited to Elinore's party, where he again meets Jane and learns that after all Jane's correspondence and not Elinore's photograph was the real attraction.

He proposes an immediate marriage and Jane happily complies. It is late at night when they visit the parson but he marries them and gives them his blessing.

The next day Jane and Tom return to the college town and the boys are introduced to the bride.

THE LITTLE PROSPECTOR.—Silas Kendall, a prospector, and his daughter Nell, so the story goes, are prospecting in the mountains, a few miles above Canyon City, a little Western town, and the basis of supplies for the hundreds of more or less successful gold prospectors. Kendall has built him a cabin and he and his daughter, a robust little woman, have managed to eke out a living, always hopeful some day of making the "big strike." Kendall is old and not thoroughly responsible at times. In fact, his simplicity and childish trust in all strangers has earned him the uncomplimentary title of half-wit. Twice before our story opens he has lost two valuable claims because of his too freely proclaiming his finds with the consequence that his claims have been staked by other prospectors.

The story opens showing Kendall and his daughter leaving the cabin for the hills. The girl works with him until close to the noon hour when she lays aside her pick and shovel to return to the cabin and prepare dinner. While she is thus engaged, there is a knock at the door and a young miner, Hal Martin, steps in. Martin has accidentally wounded himself in the arm while cleaning his gun and applies to the girl for help. She assists him to bind the wound and thanking her he leaves, after bashfully asking to be permitted to call again.

Kendall, at work in the hills, is about to give up in despair, when he turns up two small nuggets and other fine pay dirt. With a glad cry he springs to his feet and hurries back to the cabin. Showing the specimens to Nell, he tells her he is going down to Canyon City and have them assayed. Nell, however, pleads with him not to do so, having in mind the other two valuable claims which he had unwittingly lost. He finally gives in and during the old man's absence from the room Nell hides the specimens in a coffee pot.

Kendall returns and while Nell is busy outside, finds the specimens and skips out of the room.

At the town store the old miner shows the specimens to a number of miners and despite the entreaties of the old store-keeper they entice Kendall to tell them the location of the mine.

Nell returns to the cabin shortly after her father has left, finds the coffee pot on the floor and the specimens gone. She is about to give up in despair when there is a knock at the door and Hal Martin enters. The frantic girl explains her troubles and pleads with Martin to help her save the claim.

At the store the old man has boastfully told of the rich vein and minutely described it to the other miners, who, when satisfied they will have no trouble in finding the location, run out of the store, mount and ride away.

Back at the cabin Martin has listened to the story and tells the girl they must race back to the claim and beat the others to it. The girl quickly saddles a horse, Martin mounts his own and the race to stake the claim begins.

The scenes alternate between the miners and the girl and Martin. However, Martin and the girl arrive just in time, and while Martin holds the others off with his gun, the girl stakes the claim. The others, realizing they are beaten, turn away, leaving Nell and Hal alone.

KALEM COMPANY.

THE LAD FROM OLD IRELAND.—The story is very simple and direct, merely that of a young Irish lad who leaves the old country to seek his fortune in the new. His little sweetheart he leaves behind in care of her old granny, promising to return to her later on. We are given all the details of the young Irishman's trip abroad, including scenes in mid-ocean in the steerage of the Baltic; his arrival at the Castle Garden and then some bits of his career in New York concluding with his successful entrance into politics and his election as a Tammany Alderman. Of course, it would not be a real Irish drama if the young hero did not go back to Ireland just in time to save his Colleen from eviction, but the realism of the real Irish scenes makes this feature of the story remarkably convincing.

THE ROSES OF THE VIRGIN.—James Norwood, a wealthy lumber merchant, sends his dissolute son, Jack, to a lumber camp to give him a last chance to make good. The young man's habits of life, however, are so fixed that he soon forgets his good intentions and attempts to exercise his wiles on Marie, the pretty daughter of the camp foreman, although he is already a married man. Marie had previously promised her troth to Pierre Lolliard, a young lumberman long in her father's employ, but under the glamor of Jack Norwood's city ways she forgot her rustic lover and was about to elope with him when the plan was frustrated through the agency of a bunch of flowers. Pierre's mother had taken the last roses from her garden to adorn a wayside shrine of the Virgin. Marie had asked Pierre to get her some flowers intending to wear them at her wedding. Pierre, in the innocence of the intended use of the flowers steals them from the shrine but, as if by a miracle, the roses are the cause of a revelation of the true character of Jack Norwood and the elopement is stopped just in time and as a reverent and fitting climax to the play Marie and Pierre take the roses and again lay them at the feet of the Virgin whence they were originally taken.

CAST INTO THE FLAMES.—1. "Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, having set up a golden image, commanded all the princes, governors, and all the populace, to gather together and worship the image."

2. "Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego refused to worship the image. In his rage and fury Nebuchadnezzar commanded them to be brought before him."

3. "Then Nebuchadnezzar commanded that they should heat the furnace and Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego were cast into it."

4. "And lo: No hair of their head was singed, for the Son of God was there, and the flames harmed them not."

A WOMAN'S WIT.—When he decided to get married the bachelor of our story "overlooked a bet." He did not count on his landlady, who deeply desired to keep her guest.

Her strategy was successful, for, by a series of practical and embarrassing tricks she managed to make him appear so ludicrous to his fiancee that the latter found another beau.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

BEHIND A MASK.—The young wife of a commander in the army is insulted by a fashionable young man. The husband challenges him to a duel, and swords are about to be crossed when a message comes to the elder man that the enemy is advancing. He is forced to take the field, and the duel is postponed. The wife decides to fight her own battle, and sends a challenge to the disturber of domestic peace. The summons is accepted, when, masked, and dressed as a man, she fights with her adversary and overcomes him.

NANTES AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.—This charming French town possesses many features of interest. One is a "hanging bridge"—a kind of suspension bridge across which passengers are carried in a cage traveling beneath the main body of the structure. Leaving the town, with its pleasant, well-built houses, we take a steamer trip along the river, encountering many delightful bits of scenery, which are beautifully photographed, and visiting a magnificent medieval pile, the Chateau de Clisson.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

CAUGHT BY THE CAMERA.—Howard West, a young dental graduate, settles in a Western town. Being a camera enthusiast he soon makes the acquaintance of Nina Sanford, daughter of a rich rancher, and her chum, Dolores Mendez, whose brother is employed on Sanford's ranch. Both girls are active picture makers and the trio make many trips into the surrounding country for the purpose of making snap-shots. West falls in love with Nina who reciprocates his affection and Dolores, as well, has given her heart to the good-looking dentist though she conceals her passion, knowing West's love for Nina. Mendez also loves Nina and is discharged from Sanford's employ for kissing her as he lifts her from her horse. West gets a new camera with an extension exposure tube that permits him to become one of the members of the group he is taking. He takes the camera out to the ranch to show the girls. Mendez poisons Sanford's mind against West and the ranchman bursts upon the group as West is about to expose a plate. Ordering the girls to the house he charges West with betraying Nina's affections. West denies the charge with heat and in his anger leaves the ranch forgetting his camera and his riding whip. The charge is so monstrous that he cannot face Nina in explanation but rides off without speaking. Meantime Mendez secures a double revenge by striking down the ranchman with West's loaded quirt. As the blow is struck he steps upon the exposure bulb of the camera and unwittingly records his crime. For the moment fate seems to be in his favor for the quirt, in connection with the facts of West's departure, seems sufficient evidence and West is apprehended and lodged in jail. Dolores has rescued the camera and is curious to see what the plate shows. She goes into her dark room and presently the damning evidence of her brother's crime flashes upon the surface of the plate. Should she shield her brother, the man she loves must die for his crime, but she cannot denounce her own flesh and blood. She compromises with her conscience by first warning her brother and then riding to the District Attorney to submit her evidence. The legal forms are quickly complied with and West is free to marry Nina, and Dolores in her unselfish love finds comfort in the thought that she has saved her hero even while she knew that he would wed another.

ROMANCE ON THE LAZY K.—Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy takes her niece, Alice Langdon, to the Lazy K ranch to recuperate from the effect of an arduous social campaign following the announcement of the engagement of Alice to a distant cousin, Rex Leachwood, who is another protege of the rich and autocratic old lady. Rex is left behind to enjoy the roof-garden performances and the comforts of his club, which is much more to his taste than roughing it on a ranch with a girl whom he is marrying only because his aunt insists and wields the ever effective club of disinheritance. But soon there comes a hurry call from the ranch. Alice has taken more than a decided liking to Donald Barton, who returns her interest compounded. Until Alice came Don was entirely content to be engaged to Bessie Bowman, daughter of the owner of Lazy K and pretty Bessie joins forces with Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy to win her sweetheart back. Rex answers the summons promptly, as is wise in an heir presumptive, but he finds Bessie decidedly interesting and proposes that they start a mild flirtation and by rousing Don's jealousy win him back for her. In hundreds of romances the scheme has worked most successfully but this time they who play with fire are burned and Rex and Bessie find themselves very much in love with each other. Rex, recklessly forgetful of the masterful Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy, urges Bessie to break her engagement to Don but she tearfully refuses though she admits that she loves only Rex. Don, on his part, has been having no easy time of it for Alice will not return to Rex the ring that marks her betrothal. It seems to be up to somebody to do something so Don and Rex get busy. Rex challenges Don to a duel and with saddened faces the rivals stalk past the girls and Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy. Don lets drop the challenge and Bessie finds it. Wild with terror she shows it to the others and they hurry after the combatants. Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy is not built on the lines of a cross country runner but she makes pretty good time though the two boys get a little tired of waiting before they hear the bulky lady crashing through the brush. As the trio come upon the field of combat the men are facing each other with unraised guns. Bessie runs to shield Rex and Alice hurries to Don. Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy throws up her hands in resignation over the first situation she ever lost control of and her anger is not greatly cooled by the fans contained in the trick pistols with which the mock duel was fought.

G. MELIES.

THE COWBOYS AND THE BACHELOR GIRLS—Nora, who is the president of the Bachelor's Club, receives a letter announcing the death of her uncle in the West and that he has made her heir to his immense fortune, including a ranch at Grey Oaks.

Nora decides to go West and take charge of the ranch and run it herself a la suffragette fashion. She invites all the girls to go with her and they start for their new home. Arriving at Grey Oaks they pay no attention to the cowboys who greet them at the station but go at once in the old stage-coach to the ranch. The cowboys follow, approach the ranch, offer their services and are rewarded by being driven from the premises.

The boys make up their minds to "get next" to the girls and devise a scheme. Two of the girls on their way to town are attacked by some of the cowboys and two of the bunch rescue the girls from the "desperadoes," the trick works and the two fellows gallantly escort the girls on their way. Two more of the girls go fishing, one of the boys fixes up like a bear, attacks the girls who are saved from "instant death" by the cowboys. The girls are deeply grateful and reward the boys by allowing them to escort them back to the ranch.

Nora is the only one left. She is beginning to think the girls have forgotten all the rules and by-laws of the club by paying attention to men. She starts on a wild ride to town, declaring she will have none of it. We watch her riding a rough and unfrequented road where we see a "Mexican greaser" lurking. He hears Nora approaching, jumps on his horse and rides to meet her. She eludes him but he follows as she urges her horse at a mad pace, he goads his animal in the chase until he comes alongside Nora and snatches her bodily from the saddle. She struggles, they both fall to the ground and she fights with the Mexican for her life.

The remaining one of the cowboys coming that way hears her screams and with a lash and a plunge he hurries to Nora's assistance. He flings the ruffian aside, but before he can pull his gun the villain attacks him with a knife which the cowboy succeeds in wrenching from his hand. This places the greaser at his mercy which he shows by allowing him to escape without further ceremony.

It is right here where the leader of the bachelor girls denounces her allegiance to the club's principles and falls into the arms and gives her heart into the keeping of the leader of the cowboys who so valiantly saved her life.

The hero and Nora go to the ranch where they are met by the rest of the girls and boys with a laugh, a shout and a hurrah.

PATHE FRERES.

THE OLD LONGSHOREMAN.—On the bustling quay a number of dock men are waiting to be taken on for the unloading of some cargo. Amongst them is an old longshoreman, who is told that he is too old for the work on hand. He wanders along, and at last is successful in persuading one of the foremen to give him a job. His strength, however, is not equal to the task, and he falls beneath his burden. Hopeless and desperately hungry, he proceeds to a soup kitchen, but arrives too late for the free distribution, and wearily turns again in quest of work. Presently he comes on a bright little girl eating and dancing on her way. In an instant he has snatched from her the roll she is eating, and makes his way to the quay. After him runs the crying child. She reaches the quay side close upon his heels, but a false step suddenly precipitates her into the water. She struggles desperately, and hearing her cry, the brave old stevedore plunges into the water to rescue her. He drags her back into safety, but alas the effort has exhausted all his remaining strength, and with one last vain attempt to stand upright, he falls dead upon the quay.

HOW RASTUS GETS HIS TURKEY.—It is the day before Thanksgiving, and Rastus, who is as black as ink, and without a cent to his name, has promised himself that, come what may, his wife Eliza and his daughter shall eat of a plump turkey the following day. Prowling round the local butchers he watches the stock of birds gradually dwindle without having the opportunity to take one unobserved. At last he becomes desperate, and when old George Green purchases the last bird he sees that his only chance is to take it from him by hook or by crook. Arriving home, Green takes the turkey out in the yard to kill it. While he turns away for a few minutes to sharpen his knife, Rastus puts his hand through a hole in the wooden fence and seizes the bird. The hole is not large enough to pull the bird through, but Rastus tries to do so, with the result that he pulls three of the planks of the fence out, and with his hand through these and still holding on to the turkey like grim death, he bolts for home. Green starts in pursuit, but Rastus soon gets away from him, although he has many a laughable difficulty to overcome, for his stony brain could not see that he could take the turkey in the other hand and drop the three boards. When Thanksgiving Day arrived the following morn, Rastus and his family had a great time over the dinner.

ISIS.—Isis was the great Moon Goddess of the Egyptians. She is the protectress of Thyrsa, a beautiful singer, for whom she chooses Prince Dilo as husband, sending him a message to that effect. The prince seeks out Thyrsa, and charmed with her grace and beauty, is more than willing to marry her and discard Sara, his former favorite. Sara, however, jealous of her rival, informs Dilo that Thyrsa has other lovers, and the Prince, giving vent to his scorn and repugnance for the singer, returns to his palace. Thyrsa is humiliated, the more so that she loves Dilo deeply. Heartsick, she carries her grief to the Moon Goddess, who, taking pity on her, declares that Dilo shall be punished. Taking on the form of flesh and blood, she descends from her seat in the temple, and appearing to Dilo in his sleep, creates in his heart a love for herself. Dilo, springing up out of his sleep, follows her blindly until she reaches the temple, when, after slowly mounting the steps to her seat, she changes back into lifeless stone.

A DOG'S INSTINCT.—Irene Donald is employed at a milliner's, and as usual at midday, her maid sends Fido, the faithful black poodle, to bring [illegible]. On her way home Irene is accosted by the attentions of a man, and he accosts her [illegible] to Miss Fellows for [illegible] Irene enters the apartment and [illegible] Fido barks, but Fido's [illegible] tells him [illegible] something wrong, and he runs downstairs [illegible] the stranger who proceeds to act [illegible] Fido returns with a number of [illegible] The dog [illegible] Irene's hiding place [illegible] under the bed and leaves the room. He then proceeds [illegible] but is [illegible] by a zealous police officer and locked up at the station house for being at large without a muzzle. Meantime it is time for Irene to go home, but on her way she is waylaid and made prisoner. The dog escapes from his prison, goes to the milliner's and finds Irene has started for home already. He then makes home, finds Irene has not made her appearance and signifies to the maid to follow him. He takes her to the police station and persuades the police to accompany them. They all follow the faithful dog, who leads them to the old hut, where after a short struggle they soon overcome Irene's jailors and free her.

AN ELEVENTH HOUR REDEMPTION.—John and William Strangely, two brothers, are both in love with Catherine Miller, but it does not take Will very long to see that he has no chance, and that it is John whom Catherine prefers. Three years pass by, and John and Catherine, happily married, with a little two-year-old babe, are living on their ranch. Will comes in one morning to see them, and he finds his admiration for Catherine has not diminished. A bronco breaks away from the corral. John, Will and some of the help mount and follow in pursuit. An overhanging bough sweeps John from his horse. The others take him back to the ranch badly bruised and shaken. The doctor, who is called in, orders absolute quiet, as any shock might be fatal. Will takes from the mantel in the parlor a photo of Catherine and slips it in his pocket. She enters and he tries to make love to her. There is a scuffle. John hears it and enters. The effort is too much. He falls dead. Will rides off, and overcome with remorse, would kill himself. Better thoughts prevail, and he enlists in the army. Fifteen years elapse, and Will Strangely, now Colonel, fights with his regiment for the Union cause. He is badly wounded in the field and taken to the temporary hospital. It turns out to be his late brother's ranch. He looks at his nurse; she reminds him of Catherine. He bids her look at a photo that he has carried in his pocket for nearly twenty years. She recognizes her mother, and calls her in. They shake hands and Catherine forgives him. Officers carrying a flag enter to announce victory. Will rises in bed half conscious, and waving his sword, expires, while his brother officers reverently cover his body with the flag for which he fought.

THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR.—A quaint old tavern almost in the shadow of Windsor Castle, frequented by Falstaff and his associates, furnishes an admirable background for the introduction of the immortal Shakespeare comedy.

Seated at the garden table and being served by Anna Page—conversation waxes warm and Falstaff quarrels with his friends, but not losing an opportunity to enter into a flirtation with the fair Anna and in his conceit gloats over his conquest. Mrs. Page and Mrs. Ford become objects of his wistful eye—he confides his intentions to his companions and announces that he will write them both a letter declaring his admiration. Unfortunately Mr. Ford overhears the reading of the message to his wife. At this juncture Mr. and Mrs. Page and Mrs. Ford arrive and a cordial greeting ensues. Ford plainly shows his jealousy and is bent upon revenge.

As the company retire to their respective places of abode, Falstaff despatches his servant post haste to deliver the notes to the ladies—while Ford watches from a secret hiding—a hurried visit from Mrs. Page reveals the fact that both letters are identical. "Let it suffice thee, Mistress Page, that I love thee: I will not say, pity me: 'tis not a soldier-like phrase: but I say love me. By me, John Falstaff." They decide upon a plan to reply that the husband will be absent from his home between 10 and 11 o'clock. Ford, in disguise, follows the maid as she goes to deliver the letter—arriving at Falstaff's he engages him in conversation and learns the contents of the letter and at once hastens to the market rounding up friends to help search his house.

Falstaff undecided which of the two he will first call upon, decides it shall be Mrs. Ford. In the midst of his proffers of love, Mrs. Page announces husband—confusion follows. Falstaff is concealed in the clothes basket with the dirty linen—the servants are ordered to carry the basket out and it is dumped in the lagoon, which causes Falstaff much uneasiness as well as a dampened ardor for love making. Yet upon making his escape he is undaunted and again meets Mrs. Ford when a loud knocking at the door sends them all in confusion and the clothes basket is refused as a haven, but an old outfit of the housemaid serves as a disguise and he is quickly hustled out. Explanations and reconciliation between the Pages and the Fords are soon complete and Falstaff is invited to meet Mrs. Page. In the fairy glade—Will o' the wisps—fairies—demons, etc., break in upon the love scene and Falstaff is crowned with buck horns and all ends.

NO PLACE LIKE HOME.—After a hard and weary day's work, Silas Green is sitting in the midst of his beloved ones, seeking a much needed rest. He is the proud father of six healthy children who thoroughly appreciate their father and for that reason make him the target of their pranks. They enjoy their ring-around-a-rosie best when they can get father in the center, and little Johnny is developing a talent for lassoing and after many attempts succeeds in getting his father in the sling. Mrs. Silas Green agrees with her husband that he would be able to secure a better rest by spending a vacation in some quiet hotel, so he packs his baggage and as Sackville in the Pines holds forth great promises he makes that his destination.

We all know that the cab drivers are a greedy lot and for that reason Silas decides that a brick wagon will do the same service. He is not gone very far when a wheel breaks, the jolt scattering the bricks over poor Silas. He crawls from under the wagon in a sore condition and limps on to the end of his journey.

The hotel proprietor is of a rather flirty disposition who preferred to squander his valuable time on the pretty lady guests and therefore had little time for Silas. Nevertheless he is shoved into his room and Silas starts his rest. A beautiful blonde mistakes Silas' room for hers, and seeing Silas resting on a bed, her anger has no bounds. He is pounced upon before given a chance to explain after which she is very profuse in her excuses.

Next to his room two champion boxers are located, but as Silas had enough of this at home, he did not appreciate their efforts and considered their noise altogether unnecessary. He taps on the wall, which brings the two experts into his room and they give Silas a few lessons. After a series of similar disturbing incidents, he at last decides to rest on the lawn, takes his bed clothes with him. However, there the flirty proprietor comes along, accompanied by the beautiful blonde. They are so interested in each other they do not notice Silas, the proprietor carelessly throws a lighted match on him, the bed clothes start on fire and Silas is favored with a pail of water.

At last, it was too much for him, he returns home where he is received with open arms. He puts his suitcase on the floor and falls asleep on it, in the midst of his noisy youngsters.

DRUMSTICKS.—Married contrary to her father's wishes, the daughter is disowned by the father. She is now a widow with a little boy named Jack and, very much impoverished, she appeals to her father for aid; he refuses to help her and so informs her.

An old farmer on his way to market with several crates of poultry stops at the widow's home, asks for a drink of water, which is given him by Jack. The boy is very much attracted by the poultry and takes a particular liking to a little turkey, which the farmer gives to Jack as a present.

Jack is delighted with this little turkey, names him "Drumsticks," and makes a pet of him. There is nothing too good for the "turk," which grows under his master's care and attention to be as fine a specimen of gobbler as ever stood on two legs or sounded a "gobble-gobble."

Thanksgiving Day is drawing near, and "Drumsticks" is admired by all who see him. Unfortunately, he comes under the notice of the landlord when he calls on Jack's mother for the rent, which is overdue. Mrs. Pell cannot meet his demand for the money and he insists upon taking "Drumsticks" in payment for the rent.

Poor "Drumsticks" is sacrificed, plucked and dressed, and while awaiting the arrival of the landlord, little Jack, who is heartbroken at the loss of his turkey friend, writes a note asking the person who gets "Drumsticks" for Thanksgiving dinner to write him (Jack Pell) if he is tender, attaches this note to one of "Drumstick's" legs, and the bird is carried away to the nearest market and placed on sale.

We little know what a day may bring forth, and what we lose one way may be made up in some other way. It so happens that Mrs. Pell's father buys the turkey and has it sent to his home. The hired girl finds Jack's note, shows it to Jack's grandfather, who at first feels resentful, but gradually thaws as he thinks of those of his own flesh and blood and with whom he has been so severe.

His whole manner changes; he gets into his overcoat, orders his horse and sleigh, puts "Drumsticks" into a basket and hurries to his daughter's home, asks her forgiveness and hugs her and her little boy, then points to "Drumsticks," asking them to come home and share the Thanksgiving dinner and make their home with him. It does not take them long to get ready, and he takes them in his sleigh to his own fireside, where we see them seated around the table giving thanks and having a jolly good time, while they feast on "Drumsticks." Little Jack cannot forget his pet, takes a little toy turkey which his grandfather has given him for a Thanksgiving present, and erects a little monument in loving memory of "Drumsticks," who gave him so much joy and was the means, after all, of bringing him and his mother so much happiness and good luck.

A MODERN COURTSHIP.—Sue has a strong objection to marrying a bald-headed man, and when she discovers that her dear Jack has a small bald spot on the top of his head she is horrified and immediately dismisses him.

Being assured of incipient baldness by many of his friends, Jack secures some of the remedies recommended, applies them to the bare spot, and after a month sees that the baldness has extended, not to mention the odors with which the lotions are infested. "Bah!" He throws the stuff out of the window and vows it is no good.

The sounds of the crashing glass has hardly died away before a slick individual enters, displays and eulogizes a great hair restorative, "BALDY'S HAIR TONIC; Never Fails and Bound to Produce Results." Jack buys a bottle, applies the liquid regularly and finds at the end of the week he is balder than ever. "A wig for mine," says Jack, and he gets one, a perfect fit and a perfect beauty. He meets the "Baldy Hair Tonic" man, who is delighted with the fine head of hair Jack has raised and attributes it to his tonic, insists upon Jack going to a photographer to record what can be done with the "Baldy Hair Tonic," and makes it worth Jack's while to sit for his portrait; it will make a great "ad" and business booster.

If he could fool the tonic man he can fool Sue, and she certainly will fall for the luxuriant hirsute exhibit. This is what he thinks. Sue fixes herself to receive him, ornamenting herself with a cluster of false curls to make herself more attractive.

Jack calls; he and Sue engage in a tete-a-tete. She sees his hair, is delighted, and fondly strokes his head, and he tenderly fondles her curls. Absorbed in love's reveries, she dislodges Jack's wig, grasps it, jumps up, pulling off her curls and leaving them in Jack's hand. Two of a kind; one on each. She calls it an even break, laughs, and they become re-engaged, sealing their reunion with an affectionate kiss.

THE BUM AND THE BOMB.—A "Bum" asleep at the fence outside a field where some boys are playing a game of football. They accidentally kick the ball over the fence, landing it alongside of the "bum," who is greatly disturbed, thinking the ball a bomb and expecting it to explode and blow him to kingdom come. Assured of the harmlessness of the ball he picks it up, struck with a happy idea; a ready help in time of need.

He goes to a saloon, where a party of boon companions are satisfying their thirst. He is looked upon as an intruder and they start to drive him from the place. He lifts the ball, which closely resembles a bomb. Everybody, including the bartender, vamooses, and leaves the tramp monarch of all he surveys. He proceeds quietly to help himself to what the others have left, and then makes his way to a restaurant.

He asks for a "hand-out," is refused by the proprietor, who quickly rushes from the establishment when he sees the "bum" attempt to light the bomb. The proprietor is soon followed by the customers, and "Weary Willie" sits down, partakes of a hearty meal, and is soon on his way again.

Hearing footsteps approaching, he turns around and sees a pursuing "cop." He starts "lippity-cut" down the street, chased by two policemen, the bartender and the rest of his previous acquaintances, greatly augmented by an ever-increasing crowd. Slam-bang into anybody and everybody he meets; a general mix-up, and still the chase goes on. Every turn brings a fresh laugh and funny complications. The bum finally gets a big start and peacefully stretches himself under a tree and quietly falls asleep—for a minute. The pursuers are upon him and he is led captive to jail, anticipating a six months' rest after his strenuous and busy day.

FRANCESCA DA RIMINI.—It is a beautiful story simply and clearly told; it all happened in the thirteenth century. Francesca is the daughter of Guido da Polentia, the Lord of Ravenna, Italy. Lanciotto (the Lame), a hunchback of Rimini, becomes enamoured of Francesca, although he has never seen her. Her father secures her consent to marry Lanciotto, who sends his brother Paola, a handsome youth, to bring her to Rimini and arrange the nuptials.

Paola arriving at the court of Ravenna, Francesca thinks he is Lanciotto and falls in love with him at first sight, and he with her, but Paola controls his heart's desire by proving faithful to his brother's mission. When Francesca meets Lanciotto she is shocked at his ugliness, and cannot help making comparison with his attractive brother, whom she really loves and, in fact, shows her preference. Lanciotto sees it and knows the reason, but persists in his attentions and intentions, and, by the persuasion of her father, Francesca is married to Lanciotto.

Just after the marriage ceremony, before the bride and groom leave the magnificent cathedral with all its grand architecture, a messenger from the guards of the city rushes in and hands Lanciotto, who is captain of the soldiery, a message that he must join his army and be off to war. Ever faithful to the call of duty, Lanciotto takes his sword from the bearer of the message, gives Francesca over to the care of Paola during his absence, and hastily departs.

Pepe, the jester of the court, heartily dislikes Lanciotto, and readily sees the true state of affairs and never fails to mock and ridicule his crippled master. He is delighted when he learns that Francesca and Paola love each other, and is constantly on the "qui vive" for evidence of his suspicions. The lovers in the gorgeous gardens of Rimini are wrapped in love's sweet thoughts and rhapsody, and are irresistably drawn in each other's embrace, kiss and stand transfixed.

Pepe, spying every movement of the couple, dashes from his place of hiding and hastens to Lanciotto's camp, running through the wood and glen like a maddened hound. He reaches Lanciotto's tent, informs him of his wife's and brother's unfaithfulness, only to meet the cripple's wrathful indignation and contempt. The shaft of venom has been sunk deep by Pepe into the heart of Lanciotto, urging him to mount his horse and gallop furiously in the midst of an approaching storm to his palace, there to learn the truth of the jester's report.

As the lightning flashes and the thunder roars he reaches the portals of his home, throws aside the curtains and beholds his wife in the embrace of his brother. With terrible denunciations and uncontrolled anger he draws his dagger, raises it to kill, when a stroke of lightning, attracted by the glistening steel, glances from the dagger and strikes the two lovers dead. The climax is a conception of dramatic art, inspired genius, sustaining to the end what proves the par excellence of the Vitagraph "life portrayals."

AMERICAN.

STARLIGHT'S DEVOTION.—Back in the East, Dick Carewe loved Ethel Morgan. He was poor, and she was a daughter of wealth. Dick's fine manhood and sterling qualities awakened an all-devouring love in Ethel's heart. Their troth was pledged, and Ethel's father was consulted. Mr. Morgan had struggled hard for his wealth. His money had blinded him against righteousness, and in a spirit of mercenary prejudice he repulsed Dick.

Resolved to obtain his loved one, Dick resolved to obtain the fortune Morgan demanded his son-in-law should possess. The land of opportunity, the West, called him. He bade his sweetheart good-bye, and with her locket about his neck left for the West and opportunity, vowing not to communicate with Ethel until he was ready to return and lay a fortune at her feet, or rather her father's feet.

Lone Gulch was his destination, and once there he began prospecting. A filter of gold dust in the bed of a stream attracted him and he staked a claim.

His camp was on the edge of an Indian reservation and it was quite natural that he should meet Starlight, a daughter of the tribe. She was a sweet, romantic little thing, and instantly fell in love with Dick. He, unaware of the girl's passion, lavished kindnesses upon her, innocently nurturing her love, until her whole life was wrapt up in him.

Starlight was betrothed to a young brave of her tribe, the choice of her father. The young Indian hated Dick, and vowed a jealous vengeance, inspiring in Starlight a fear for the safety of the white man.

Back home, Ethel was grieving for Dick. Her unsatisfied love was slowly killing her and the family physician, powerless to administer to the love-sick maiden, advised a change of climate. Mr. Morgan owned a ranch in the vicinity of Lone Gulch, and he took Ethel out there to recuperate.

Dick had kept his vow of silence and had never written to Ethel, so she was ignorant of his whereabouts.

Starlight and Ethel became great friends. Perhaps it was the magnetism of their common love that attracted them to each other. Neither was conscious of the other's love for Dick.

The little claim petered out, and the young prospector became discouraged. He resolved to seek his fortune elsewhere.

Wandering over the Arizona desert without water, food or horse, half dead from thirst and exhaustion, Dick fell unconscious at the edge of a cliff overlooking a canyon. The earth gave way and he was plunged into the river a hundred feet below.

Starlight, in her canoe, saw Dick fall, and she rescued him from a watery grave. Fearing to take him to her own people lest the young brave carry out his threat, she fetched bandages and blankets, and under an old tree, nursed Dick back to life.

Accidentally she discovered the locket about his neck, and the realization of his love for Ethel overcame her. She fought a great battle of self-sacrifice and took the man she loved back to Morgan's ranch. Her heart broke when she beheld the greeting of the two lovers and the reconciliation of the father, and she wandered away through the woods until she came to the old tree. With heart-broken devotion she crooned over the spot where Dick had lain while she nursed him. All the wonderful reserve of her race was manifest in the drowning of her anguish. She had loved and lost. She must suffer.

Nature cried out its comfort. The daughter of nature sank into the embrace of the gnarled old tree of centuries, and was soothed by the whisper of the wind in the branches.

LUX FILMS.

IN FRIENDSHIP'S NAME.—We are first shown little Edith with her big playfellow, Jack. Both are great friends, and trouble Edith's papa sorely. Ten years elapse and Edith has become a pretty little maiden, whose heart has been captured by a dashing young man, Charlie. The latter asks papa's consent, but his few halting words are only laughed at, and Charlie takes his leave in deep disgust. Meeting Edith, he is severely scolded, that young lady, with delightful feminine inconsistency, first calling him a "silly" and then deciding to run away. She writes a note to her father and packing a trunk, sets off. But she must see her old playmate, Jack, and accordingly a very downcast maiden presents herself at Jack's house. He is greatly pleased by her visit, but when she explains what has happened and how she loves Charlie, Jack—true friend though he is—cannot repress a fury. He loves Edith dearly, but she only returns his affection in a sisterly way. Hardly has Edith related her troubles, when Charlie is announced. He too, has decided to seek the advice of his old friend, Jack, and the latter, after listening to his tale, sends him to join Edith. Meantime papa has read his daughter's note and hastened off to consult Jack. The latter brings the two lovers in, hand-in-hand, and after some little persuasion all objections are removed. With a hearty grip of the hand, the two men take leave of Jack, and then Edith comes to say good-bye. Jack looks lovingly at her, and then embraces the fair form of the one he so truly loves. The lovers leave and Jack, who, in friendship's name, has accomplished so much with sacrifice to himself, is left alone with his own sad thoughts.

POWERS PICTURE PLAYS.

THE NEW MAGDALEN.—Mercy Merrick, a beautiful young English woman, is the victim of a heartless man. When she learns that he is married she is about to commit suicide and is prevented from doing so by Julian Gray, a young curate. Determined to redeem herself, Mercy enlists as a red cross nurse in the Franco Prussian war. Grace Roseberry is on her way to England to be adopted by her relative Lady Janet Roy, and in passing through the lines she is struck by a piece of shell and left for dead. Mercy Merrick exchanges clothes with Miss Roseberry and takes her letter of introduction, goes to England and is adopted as Grace Roseberry and saves her life. Julian Gray, who is Lady Roy's nephew falls in love with Mercy Merrick, not recognizing her as the woman he had saved from suicide. They are engaged to be married. The real Grace Roseberry is about to be taken away as a lunatic when Mercy Merrick's best nature asserts itself and she declares herself to be an imposter and saves the other woman. In a touching scene, Mercy Merrick goes to bid farewell to Julian Gray and to give him his ring, but the noble young minister tells her that she has suffered enough, and as his wife, the repentent Mercy finds a true shelter. This picture is superbly staged and acted and this title on a banner will fill your house.

THOU SHALT NOT KILL.—A Kentucky parson persuades Calab Howe and John Smithson to make a written oath that they will end their feud. Dick, the son of old man Howe gets drunk and shoots at everybody he encounters. He tackles James Danton who, in defending himself kills young Howe. Pursued by mountaineers, Danton seeks refuge in the home of the dead man's father who conceals him from the would-be lynchers. A powerful situation is presented when the old man learns that the man he has saved is the one who shot his only son. The old man is about to slay Danton. He looks at the Bible in which his oath to kill no more is written. He lowers his pistol and sends Danto nback to his family.

ABSENT-MINDED ARTHUR.—A comedy showing the comical doings of a young man who is continually forgetting what he is about. Arthur's funny mistakes when he courts his sweetheart would make a horse laugh. The mixups which follow when he meets another girl on the street and forgets his own sweetheart are funny. The climax is reached when he dons his full dress clothes to call on his young lady and forgets to put on his trousers. Imagine the funny situations that follow. This comedy will, we are sure, evoke one series of laughs. The acting is clever. The story like all Powers comedies and dramas is entirely different from anything done by anybody else.

THANHOUSER COMPANY.

A THANKSGIVING SURPRISE.—Jack Clyde is a rich young fellow who has been brought up by his wealthy uncle in a small Western town. Jack decides that he wants to move to New York, and is indulged in this whim by his uncle, who sends with the lad as valet a faithful old servant, who has his welfare at heart.

In the city, Jack rents expensive apartments, and leads a vain, idle life. Jack's uncle hears of his conduct and devises a scheme whereby he can make a thorough test of the boy. He instructs his lawyers to announce his death, that his entire fortune has gone to charity, and Jack has been left penniless.

Jack is turned out of his rooms and shunned by his rich friends. Among the very poor, whom he formerly despised, he is treated as a comrade. They share with him their last crust, and he ends by admiring them, and falling in love with a humble little flower girl. Jack finally secures a situation as porter at a hotel. His uncle discovers that he is planning to give a Thanksgiving dinner to all those poorer than himself and decides that Jack has learned his lesson.

Jack brings to his poor rooms the few meagre provisions that his week's salary has permitted him to buy. While waiting for his guests to arrive Jack goes to sleep. His uncle and the old servant, who have been watching him closely, seize upon this opportunity to enter Jack's room and substitute for his poor meal a real Thanksgiving feast. The guests arrive, their host awakes, uncle returns, and Jack is assured that his prosperity is real and not a dream.

THE WILD FLOWER AND THE ROSE.—Frank Wilson is the son of an inventor who has perfected an airship model in which Jack is greatly interested, but which neither of them have the money to finance. Wilson tries to interest his wealthy employer, Fisher, but is unsuccessful in the attempt.

However he gains the support of his employer's beautiful daughter, Rose. The old inventor suggests to his son that if he marry Rose they can secure the money to perfect the invention. But Jack spurns the idea, as he is already engaged to marry a country girl, Daisy Lane, who, he believes, loves him devotedly.

Upon learning that Daisy is a heartless coquette, Jack is heartbroken, and goes West to seek a fortune and forget her conduct. Success comes to him quickly, and he returns to tell his father that now, unaided, they can finance the invention.

On the aviation field, Jack once more meets Rose, and confesses to her that it was the memory of her kindness that helped him achieve success. Jack makes a successful flight in the invention—a new style of aeroplane and in offering her congratulations Rose confesses that she has loved him from the first.

GREAT NORTHERN FILM CO.

KEAN, OR THE PRINCE AND THE ACTOR.—The scenes are laid in London, in the year 1830. Kean, who is admired by all classes, both high and low, receives an invitation to a reception at the house of Count K. The reception is a gorgeous affair, and the scenes thrown on the screen are full of life and animation, and afford splendid scope for the fine photographic quality which is a distinguishing feature of this film.

Among the guests is a prince of the period, a great admirer of Kean's genius, although a reckless and amorous courtier. Anna Damby, a popular actress, is also present, and the Countess of K. The former is secretly and deeply enamoured of Kean, and the Countess also is fascinated by his charming personality. Anna is quick to observe that Kean has eyes only for the Countess.

Following, we are shown Kean, the man of the masses. We find him in a low class inn, in the purlieus of the borough, amidst roystering companions. It is a christening party, and Kean is seen kissing the baby, to the great delight of his boon comrades. They are all drinking together when a dispute arises, and Kean whips off his coat, and after a few rounds, floors his burly opponent.

In the meantime Anna Damby has been pestered with the attentions of a certain Lord M., a man of evil reputation. She rejects him with scorn, and he, knowing her infatuation for the actor, sends her a letter signed "Kean" making an appointment at the inn in the borough. Kean discovers the forgery, and a fine picture shows him exposing Lord M. in front of his friends.

In the evening we see Kean in his dressing-room getting ready for the play. Owing to financial embarrassment he is in a bad temper, and his facial expressions as he "makes up" are excellent character sketches. The Countess calls, and a love scene ensues; she presents him with her photo. Footsteps are heard and the affrighted Countess has just time to slip into another room before the Count enters accompanied by the Prince, who descries the photo, and a violent scene takes place between Kean and the Prince, who discloses his love for the Countess, and declares that he will have no rival in the field. The actor resents interference in his love affairs and gets so furious that he declines to act that night. However, he is prevailed upon by his confreres on the stage not to disappoint the audience.

The next few pictures show the interior of Drury Lane, the crowded boxes and stalls, and the superb acting of Kean on the stage.

Suddenly the great actor catches sight of the Prince flirting with the Countess in a box. Jealousy gets the upper hand, and to the astonishment of the audience he throws aside his acting and walking quickly up to the footlights shouts out a terrible accusation against the Prince. This creates a scandal amongst the audience, and Kean has to be forcibly removed from the stage. The final scenes show the intercession of Anna Damby, and the noble generosity of the Prince, who not only forgives the insult, but once again becomes the devoted admirer and friend of the gifted actor, who learns to appreciate the love and affection of Anna.

ECLAIR.

THE WRECK.—The great Morgan, while on one of his plunderous adventures, sights a drifting raft, on which there appear to be two human forms. He orders a boat to be lowered for an investigation, and his men discover that there are an old man and a young woman adrift on the raft. The two unfortunates are rescued, and relate their story to Morgan, their deliverer.

They tell him that being forced to leave their country, they set sail, but their ship is overtaken by a band of pirates, who claim to be men belonging to the company of the great Morgan. After robbing them, the two are left on the raft to perish. Morgan is outraged at learning that any others should presume to use his glorious name, and sets out to find the villainous offenders. He soon comes across a band of pirates, and the young girl, with much fear, identifies her aggressors. A fight ensues, in which Morgan attacks the band single-handed, and comes out victorious. He then sets the young girl and her father safely on their journey again, bidding them have no fear of further molestation.

True to his ideal of justice, Morgan the Pirate, has once more championed the cause of the weak, and mightily avenged.

A DIFFICULT CAPTURE.—Two policemen are endeavoring to capture a couple of thieves, who seem about to escape with their plunder. Just as the officers are becoming discouraged and are about to give up the chase, a fairy appears and presents them with a magic wand, which, she informs them, will enable them to realize all their wishes.

With this powerful weapon, they decide there is no hurry necessary, and so they leisurely partake of a delicious luncheon and continue the pursuit. The thieves have endeavored to evade the authorities by jumping into a balloon which immediately ascends and is soon lost to view among the clouds. The police do not hesitate, they immediately wish for an aeroplane, and start a most wonderful chase through the atmosphere. The balloon becomes disabled, and falls to the ground; the thieves leap out unhurt. At that moment the aeroplane swoops down, the police wish for a cage to surround the villains; as quick as thought, the cage springs up around the runaways and they are captives before they realize the fact.

The two officers then bear their prisoners triumphantly to headquarters where they receive great honors for the wonderful capture they have made.

CHAMPION.

THE INDIAN LAND GRAB. "Rush the Indian Land Grab Bill through at once if you want to save them." Thus writes the agent of Arthur Smighting, the lobbyist.

The Indians are sending a young chief with companion to Washington as representative before the President and cabinet, to secure justice and proper redress for the fraudulent barter of their lands, to which outrages they have been subjected, owing to their helplessness to prevent it.

Smighting is very much perturbed at this possible hindrance which threatens to upset his apparently successful land fraud, and he immediately convenes a caucus at the capitol of those legislators of his brand who can be "approached" for the ultimate motive of securing the passage of the bill.

To doubly ensure the accomplishment of his desire, he enlists the services of his family, in that he instructs his daughter to exert her charm over the young Indian so as to possibly keep him away from the object of his visit.

Their efforts are successful and the young Indian is installed as a guest at the palatial home of the lobbyist.

The young chief becomes enthralled at the beauty and charm of the girl and it is no difficult matter to make him dance attendance on her constantly. His task is an important one, however, and he manages to fulfill his mission in presenting his people's grievances at the capitol, and he so forcibly asserts the injustice of the enactment of this bill that the weaker element of the opposing forces are compelled to pause.

They, therefore, arrange a conclusive meeting for the following day at one o'clock. The meeting is actually held at 1 a. m., and not at 1 p. m., as the Indian had naturally supposed. By this trick they lost what probably might have been averted had they been present at the essential moment.

To clinch the situation, the lobbyist's daughter held a ball at their home in honor of the guests. In the midst of the dancing, however, an attache at the capitol appears and apprises the Indian of the deception. Spurning the girl who tries to detain him he reaches the rendezvous only to find that the bill has been passed. He argues and denounces, entreats and implores his adversaries, but of no avail. Despondent and humiliated, he returns to his people.

It had required this sudden change of affairs to bring as a shock the realization to the girl that she intensely loves the red man. Determined to undo the wrong perpetrated in the part she played, with earnest entreaties for the righting of wrong, she prevails upon them for a signed statement that will leave the Indians their land.

Hurrying Westward she arrives in time to prevent the summary death sentence being inflicted on the young chief by those whose cause he lost, through her machinations. Leaving the parchment with the tribe, she follows the young red man into the woods, and at his request to return to her people she refuses. Finally he is overcome by her witchery and womanly love and her promise to become his squaw among his people.

NESTOR FILM COMPANY.

A DEAL IN INDIANS.—The two lonesome bachelors were to be lonesome bachelors no longer. Tom's father, the professor, was coming and with him Lucille and her chum, Beatrice. Dick would at last meet his friend's sister, while Tom was none the less delighted at the prospect of again seeing her chum.

The entire party, including Matilda, the professor's maiden sister, arrived. The young people, however, worried very little about the good lady and her brother, but busied themselves in the pleasant occupation of becoming better acquainted.

So the days flew happily by until a lover's quarrel bid fair to spoil both pretty romances. Luckily, at this juncture, an Indian strode past, and when the boys promised to take the party to their encampment where they might behold the noble redman in all his picturesque regalia, the young men were speedily forgiven.

Once at the encampment, the professor insisted upon adopting Chief Pain-in-the-Face as an exhibit when delivering his forthcoming Indian lectures; and, although ignorant of what the old gentleman wanted of him, upon being assured that his services would be handsomely rewarded the young Indian readily consented.

Their opinion of the Indian, however, underwent a sudden change when they beheld his disregard for knives and forks and his intense partiality for the professor's whiskey.

After pocketing his winnings in a poker game with the boys, and disposing of what wine and whiskey he could find, the chief sought the room assigned to him. Instead he entered Matilda's and spying a bottle on the bureau, proceeded to sample same. It proved to be hair dye! With a howl of pain the Indian let it fall and staggered out, while Matilda sat up in bed screaming for help. Hearing the others coming, the poor fellow sneaked into the girls' room and crawled under the bed, where, after Lucille and Beatrice had fled in terror, he was finally found and booted from the house.

The Professor, however, would not hear of his dismissal, but insisted upon the chief being reinstated, or he and the girls would leave for home. A hasty consultation resulted in heading off the Indian, taking his costume, and starting him for the encampment in a hurried, which he held on solely because they insisted. Dick was then primed and carefully dressed in Pain-in-the-Face's regalia, and so completely did it disguise him that not only was the professor fooled, but when the real Indian returned from camp, Lucille actually pulled her chum's hair for allowing the supposed Dick to make love to her.

Here Tom entered with a minister, but sincerely regretted his haste, when he discovered that he had sent his sister out to merry the chief instead of his dear friend. Fortunately, there were no witnesses handy, so that Dick arrived in time to take Pain-in-the-Face's place, greatly to the relief of all concerned, even the professor, who was forced to give his blessing, or have a real Indian son-in-law, so Lucille declared.

The professor's interest in Indians had strangely subsided.

COLUMBIA.

STAGE-COACH TOM. Tom Allan, the driver of the overland coach, is secretly engaged to Cattle King Osborne's daughter, Rose. The father, suspecting an attachment, has sent Rose to a convent to complete her education. Shortly before her return, Tom receives a letter from her, stating she is coming home for the Summer with her aunt, Sister Angelica. Soon after her arrival, the father interrupts them during a love scene and forbids Tom speaking to her again. The young couple elope and are angrily pursued by the father, who catches them just after the marriage ceremony.

He is furious, discharges Tom, and as his anger grows has him thrown from other positions until the young couple are at starvation point and Tom is almost desperate enough to commit a crime.

Sister Angelica visits them and persuades Tom to allow his wife to plead to her father. It is useless. The old man drives her from the door.

Soon after Sister Angelica is called in a low dance hall to minister to a wounded ruffian and learns of a plot to stampede the horses and cattle and burn the property of Tom's father-in-law.

Panic-stricken, she runs to Stage-coach Tom, the only man near by, and tells him of the plot.

Tom is delighted to learn of his enemy's punishment and refuses to aid him. The nun pleads for him to save his wife's father and finally by force of religious influence she prevails upon his better nature and he rouses a band of cowboys, captures the half breed rustlers and becomes reconciled to his wealthy father-in-law.

THE CATTLEMEN'S FEUD.—This is a romance of the broad prairies of the West—of herds of countless cattle, of man's greed for pastured fields, ripening to resentment until the border is flamed to feud fury. After a thrilling conflict between the ranchers, peace finally triumphs through a union of loving hearts.

YANKEE

THE HEART OF AN ACTRESS.—When Marcelle Gireoux, beautiful, poised, mysterious musical comedy star appeared at the Gayety, and Brisbane saw her, he soon began to take observations. He observed that her presence planted Vesuvius in his heart. He arranged for an introduction at the first opportunity and was admitted behind the scenes, to her dressing room.

Marcelle liked Brisbane and made no secret of it, but he misunderstood her affection for a stronger feeling and imagined his conquest would be an easy one. But hers was a companionable sort of friendship and she allowed him to go no further.

Meanwhile Brisbane was neglecting his home, his business, everything for this woman. He deluged her with endearing letters, showering her with presents. Madly he promised himself to win this ideal of his dreams.

Marcelle, by mere accident learned of Brisbane's home ties and discovers the cause of his wife's broken heart. She realizes what a terrible mistake she has innocently made in leading this man on, so she determines to open his eyes to the fact that their relationship must cease. A note dispatched to Mrs. Brisbane and another to him bring them both to the apartment of the actress, where he is brought to the realization of his folly in the nick of time.

Some time later, Marcelle, with her husband and child, pay the Brisbanes a friendly call and find them happy in each other's love, made stronger each day by the memory of one who lifted the clouds and made the sun to shine in two lives where doubt and despair existed.

SAVED BY A VISION.—Nellie, the sweatshop beauty, was of a romantic turn of mind. She had read of daring knights of old who rescued fair maidens from castles and prisons; of poor girls who won the hearts of millionaires and lived thereafter in luxury; but in Levinsky's cloak shop, where she toiled for a paltry wage, there was no romance in her life—nothing but nerve-racking noise and ceaseless work.

Then she met a man who impressed her as being the ideal of her dreams. He was a buyer who visited the firm and was attracted by her beauty. When he called at her humble home, Nellie's mother wisely gave him to understand he was not welcome. She wanted Nellie to marry Albert, a young student who loved her devotedly.

Angered at her mother's interference, Nellie retired to her room and sobbed herself to sleep. In her dreams she married the man of wealth and became the mistress of a beautiful home; but happiness for her was short lived. She found her husband's social set a maze of sin and corruption, an atmosphere far different from that her fancy had pictured. She realized, too late, that her husband was tiring of her charms. Then he deserted her and she began to sink down to the depths.

In a low dive she sat brooding, her glass of rum untouched. There was a noise of shuffling feet and moving chairs nearby and she turned to find the man who had ruined her life chatting gaily with a sweet faced girl just a few feet away. Then she went mad. Little red spots danced before her eyes and a voice whispered in her ear, "Kill! Kill!"

The man turned as her fingers tightened on his throat and reading determination in her eyes, tore himself from her grasp and rushed to the door. Screaming wildly, she grasped a bottle and threw it with all her might, but the missile went wide of its mark and crashed through a window. Then the crowd closed in on her and the police came. Fighting like a tigress she strove to escape, but the odds were against her and she fainted. When consciousness returned, she found herself in her own room. Several days later, when Albert and her wealthy suitor both came, Nellie found the task of choosing between them an easy one. Now she knows what happiness means and Levinsky has lost his sweatshop beauty. She's too busy caring for an eight-pound baby boy.

ONE TOUCH OF NATURE.—Rose Creyton, a young country girl, is loved by her old childhood friend, Tom Lawton. While not exactly reciprocating Tom's affection, she is fond of him and, but for the arrival into their quiet village of Richard Hartley, the course of true love would probably have worked out its own salvation. Rose is attracted by the citified manner and "store" clothes of Hartley, to whom her fresh and innocent beauty is a revelation, and they become engaged. Mrs. Creyton is not pleased with her daughter's acceptance of Hartley's attentions and does all within her power to prevent Rose from receiving them. Tom finally musters up courage to propose to Rose, who tells him of her engagement to Hartley and expresses her regret at having to wound her old friend. Tom takes the blow manfully and decides leaving the old village for some far Western country, in search of forgetfulness. He wishes Rose happiness, takes a photograph of her which she gives him, goes West and starts mining. Rose's married life proves a complete failure. Her husband turns out a drunkard and gambler, and she and the little boy who has come to them have a hard time of it. Finally, in an outburst of drunken rage, Hartley strikes his wife and, thinking he has killed her, flees, taking with him the child so that he may not be on hand to testify against him. He goes West, and as luck would have it, locates at a mining town close to which is Tom's mine and cabin. Hartley is killed in a drunken brawl and the child, fleeing for his life, runs away, finally falling exhausted at the door of Tom's cabin, just at the moment when Tom, desperate over continued hard luck, decides to end it all. The arrival of the boy saves him. Finding that the child has neither father nor mother, Tom decides to adopt him. His luck suddenly changes and to adopt him. His luck suddenly changes and fortune smiles upon the strangely assorted pair. For two years they remain together, growing fonder of each other all the time. In the meantime, Rose has been searching everywhere for her lost boy. She finally gets a clue which leads her to the mining town where her husband met death and learns the whereabouts of her boy. Eagerly starting for the place, she finds not only the boy but her old lover. The boy has learned to love Tom too dearly to be willing to leave him.

"IMP."

THE REVOLVING DOORS.—Jack and Mabel and Jim and Alice, two couples who have never met, have reached the same stage in their love affairs; Jack is about to propose an immediate marriage to Mabel; and Jim is also planning to have the nuptial knot tied at once with Alice. Through the exchange of notes, the two couples make appointments to meet in private rooms at the Cafe Bon Bon and both of the young men secure the services of the same clergyman.

The head waiter of the cafe is suddenly taken away and compelled to appear in a police court, and in his haste fails to leave instructions regarding the two rooms assigned to the young couples. The consequence is, that when the young people appear, which they do singly, they have no idea as to the exact room in which they are to meet, but start out to seek each other. Through the unfortunate instrumentality of two revolving doors, with which the rooms are provided, Jack constantly passes Mabel and Jim continually passes Alice, one entering as the other leaves and vice versa.

However, Jack meets Alice at every turn and Jim meets Mabel; Jack meets Jim; and Mabel meets Alice, until all four are convinced that they are being pursued for some sinister purpose by the others.

In desperation, they all four enter the telephone booths and, simultaneously, each one telephones to their intended to ask them why they have failed to appear, as per arrangement. Each one, receiving word that the other has already gone to keep the appointment, they resume the search. Jack and Jim finally compare notes and each tells of the existence of another girl who is flitting about the place and they strike hands in a bargain to find her and bring her forth for the benefit of the other.

The girls meet and enter into the same sort of compact. But when Jack meets Alice and Jim meets Mabel, the girls, imagining that they are still being impertinently hounded, refuse to listen to the attempts of the young men to straighten out matters, and both of them stop up their ears. Jack and Jim retire in desperation. The old clergyman finally arriving on the scene, the trouble is explained to him and he is requested to wait in the corridor and stop and hold all unattended young ladies who come near him. The young men then start out on another search, each one taking an opposite direction.

When Mabel and Alice appear and start to compare notes, the clergyman obeying his instructions, seizes them both around their waists and proceeds to hold them. At this most inauspicious moment, the clergyman's wife enters the corridor and gazing in horror upon this seeming display of the old man's depravity, she attacks him most ferociously. He pleads for mercy and tries to explain, but only the sudden arrival of Jack and Jim, the reuniting of the parted couples and the consequent explanations, save him from physical and social destruction at the hands of his better half.

A CHILD'S JUDGMENT.—The trouble begins when young Mrs. Parker's brother, Bob Jordon, is arrested, charged with a crime, convicted on circumstantial evidence and sentenced to the penitentiary. Mr. Parker believes Bob guilty and refuses to aid him in any way, while Mrs. Parker is perfectly miserable, knowing her brother to be innocent.

Mrs. Parker finally receives a letter from a friend, advising her that her brother's escape from the penitentiary is about to be accomplished and requesting her to take care of him when he arrives. She shows this letter to her husband and asks his aid, but he not only refuses any assistance whatever, but informs her that if he finds her brother, he will turn him over to the authorities.

Bob arrives while Parker is out and is joyfully received by Mrs. Parker, who secretes him until she purchases a disguise for him. After he is completely disguised, she forces him to accept some money, and just as he is about to leave and while she is giving him a farewell embrace, Mr. Parker enters and not recognizing Bob, heaps the basest of accusations upon his wife's head. Bob steps forward to explain, but is prevented by his sister, who places her hand over his mouth and facing her husband, bids him believe what he will. This so enrages Parker that he attempts to strike her, but is prevented by Bob.

At this instant, the only child of the Parkers, a little daughter, comes into the room and runs to her mother. Tearing the child from the mother's arms, Parker orders the brother and sister out of the house and tells the latter that he never wants to see her face again.

Bob and Mrs. Parker take a cheap apartment in the neighborhood, where the wife and mother sits grieving for her husband and child, while Parker is just as miserable in his home, grieving for his wife.

One day, the nursemaid takes the little one out into the park to play and while the child is thus engaged she amuses herself by flirting with a policeman. Bob happens to be passing and noticing his little niece, runs home to his sister and informs her that she now has the opportunity of seeing her daughter once more. Mrs. Parker hastens to the spot and while the nursemaid's back is turned, has a little visit with her child. When she starts to leave, however, the little girl refuses to be again parted from her and insists upon accompanying her, and yielding to her mother-longing, Mrs Parker takes the little one back to her apartment.

The nurse soon discovers the disappearance of her charge and telling her policeman friend to seek for the child everywhere, she runs home and informs Mr. Parker of the loss. He immediately summons aid from the police and scours the neighborhood, and while passing Mrs. Parker's apartment house, sees his little daughter playing with her doll in an upper window.

Rushing upstairs into the room, accompanied by an officer, Parker confronts his wife and asks for his child. The officer, stepping forward, is about to take the child by force, when Parker, overcome by better thoughts, waves him back and says, "No, let the child decide!" The little girl is placed between her parents and his told to choose. The child wavers between the two for a moment and then running to her mother, clasps her arms about her neck. The father, abiding by her decision, then walks sorrowfully from the room.

Bob, who has been concealed during this interview, tells his sister he is going to end it all, and breaking from her, he hurries to the Parker home, which he enters through a window and confronting his brother-in-law tells him he has come to right a great wrong. Parker springs at him with murder in his heart, when Bob removes his disguise and says calmly, "Now you know the truth—hand me over to the police!"

But Parker is so delighted at having his doubts of his wife removed, that his anger fades away instantly, and seizing Bob's hand, he begs him to take him to his loved ones.

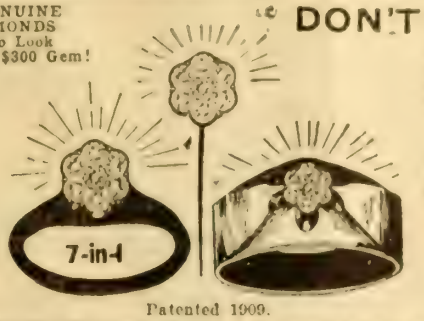
DON'T SEND A CENT

Greatest Genuine Diamond Jewelry Innovation and Sensation in Years. "A $300 flash for $30" cash.



$30 AFTER you have examined the goods in your express office!

Patented 1909.

DESCRIPTION—Each ladies' ring, men's ring, men's stud or scarf pin and ladies' carserew is set in platinum with SEVEN PERFECT BLUE WHITE GENUINE DIAMONDS, imported direct from Amsterdam by us. The setting of platinum is firmly held in 14k gold and the work is so marvelously ingenious that the seven diamonds seem to blend; GIVING ALL THE FIRE, BEAUTY AND BRILLIANCE OF A $300 DIAMOND. Not the old, flat cluster effect, but the raised setting, TIFFANY STYLE. If you want the most wonderfully beautiful bit of jewelry on the market to-day, at absurdly low cost, send us a postal card, (but no money), ordering pin, stud or ring (giving size of finger with piece of string), and we will ship at once. Open the package in your express office. If not all we claim for it, keep your money, refuse the goods, and we will pay the express charges both ways. Choice of any article, set with 7 genuine diamonds set to look like one, $30; other sizes at $40, $50, $60.

From the Patrons View Point

What Causes People

to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

This depends largely on your light and if you are using any other device than a to step down your current you are not getting best results.

With our machine you can produce a clear, white, steady light that won't worry your "house" by continuous flickering and will surprise you with the difference it makes with the films.

It is the only device that can be changed instantly to any of the three intensities without breaking the circuit between adjustments.

But this is not all. We will guarantee that our Compensarc

Will Cut 65% from Your Light Bill and we'll send you one on 30 days' free trial to prove it.

We have a little 22 page booklet that explains all the reasons why If you want a better light at ⅓ your present cost, send for it today. It's free.

Four Users of the G-E Rectifier Testify in Unmistakable Terms

Many of the users of the G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier have written us of their satisfaction with this device. Its value as a means of transforming alternating into direct current for moving picture machines has been amply demonstrated.

The following extracts from four letters tell the story better than we possibly can: Read what users say.

IMPROVED LIGHT

"We have been using the Mercury Arc Rectifier in connection with our moving picture machines for about two and one-half years and find the quality of light obtained is very much better than that obtained by using alternating current in the lamps."

HOWELL, GRAHAM, "Theato," Chattanooga, Tenn.

GREAT SAVING

"The Rectifier you furnished my Mission Street Theatre some six weeks ago is giving all we could expect in the way of good light and economy, in fact the saving is so great that I am thinking seriously of putting one in my Fillmore Street house and use the alternating current instead of direct current."

F. B. ROSS, Mgr., Premium Theatre Co., San Francisco, Cal.

RUNS WITHOUT ATTENTION

"We have used a G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier machine for almost two years. We have had at all times an excellent light and have saved a great deal in the cost of current. We have had no trouble with it—in fact it runs without any attention at all from us."

THE PRINCESS THEATRE, N. Y. City.

LONG TUBE LIFE

"I have two G-E Rectifiers in use right now and would not be without them at any cost. I believe I put the first one in use in the Pacific Coast in a picture house, and what is more I have had the same tube on it since the day it was hooked up 17 months ago."

WALTER McNEISH, Bijou Theatre, Tacoma, Wash.

YOUR Theatre Can Be Improved, Too

If you are obliged to use an alternating current supply, find out about the G-E Rectifier. Sign and mail the attached coupon. Your case will be studied by engineers, who will tell you just how much you can benefit by using this device. Send the coupon at once.

The Mirror Screen Has Revolutionized The Moving Picture Industry

Don't take our word for it—Read what those who know say about it.

Mr. J. Austin Fynes of Riverside Drive, New York, Pioneer Moving Picture man of America, for 15 years General Manager B. F. Keith's enterprises writes: "I regard the Mirror Screen as absolutely the most important invention that has yet come forth in our business, because it will kill present criticism of dark houses. Over here in New York, an ordinance has just been put forward, making lighted theaters a requisite for license. The Mirror Screen will comply with this regulation, and I don't know anything else that will or can."

Mr. J. A. Berst, of New York City, Vice-President Gen. Film Co. and also Vice-President of Pathe Freres, writes: "I unhesitatingly endorse the Wonderful Qualities of the Mirror Screen."

Mr. Charles A. Calehuff, of Philadelphia, Pa., the Leader Film Man, says: "I consider the Mirror Screen the MOST WONDERFUL INVENTION of the MOTION PICTURE WORLD."

Mr. Wm. E. Smith, Prop. The Bijou, Fond du Lac, Wis., says: "It has increased my business easily 25 per cent. It has done all that is claimed for it and more—it has put the picture business on a higher plane. People are visiting our theater that were never inside of a picture house before.

"The Best Film Made"

SYNOPSIS

"HER FATHER'S SIN"

Harold Crosby in a drunken rage kills his wife. His little daughter Helen sees his action and notifies Police Inspector Berg. A few years later Helen is adopted by a wealthy woman. Police Inspector Berg torments Helen, driving her from one home to another, because of knowledge of her father's crime. At last a young pastor intervenes, falls in love with Helen, and all ends well.

"ONE TOUCH OF NATURE"

The story deals with the unfaithfulness of a wife who deserts her husband, taking with her their little boy. The deserted husband, after many adventures, becomes wealthy and years later meets his wife. A photograph and the boy's influence bring about a happy reunion.

Glad You're Glad! TWO YANKS PER WEEK! More Hoorays!

TWO YANKS PER WEEK

Last week, we told you about our first FRIDAY YANK. Since that time we have shown a sample reel to twenty-two representative Exchange men, whose opinions count for much in the film industry of today. Every man of them placed an order. That we have made a RECORD BREAKER with is the Universal Verdict. Everyone seems glad of our Second Release.

NOTICE TO ALL EXHIBITORS

We want you to turn over to the page where the story of this film is printed. Read it over carefully and then ask yourself whether or not the "MEAT" is there, or better still, send us your name and address and we'll mail a complete cast of characters and synopsis. In the meantime, go to your Exchange and get the first showing of the film, if possible. Find out the exact date you can get bookings for and then ADVERTISE LIKE A BARNUM. We'll send you some dandy photos to help dress up your lobby. We'll do even better, READ ON!

$25.00 For the Best Lobby Display $25.00

We will pay $25.00 in cash to the theatre giving to our "QUEEN OF THE NIHILISTS" the best publicity. Decorate your theatre front and send us a photo, also sample of your program, press notices and any display advertising. Editors of "The Moving Picture World," "Moving Picture News" and "Film Reports" will adjudge the contest, and we will mail New York draft for $25.00 to the theatre they name the winner.

Write for photos, posters and bulletins today.

COMING, MONDAY, NOV. 28 The Heart of an Actress

The glare of the footlights has lured men on to ruin and disgrace. The star of this story, however, happened to be a real woman. The havoc she wrought in a happy home was recompensed by the sacrifice she made to bring about a restoration of peace.

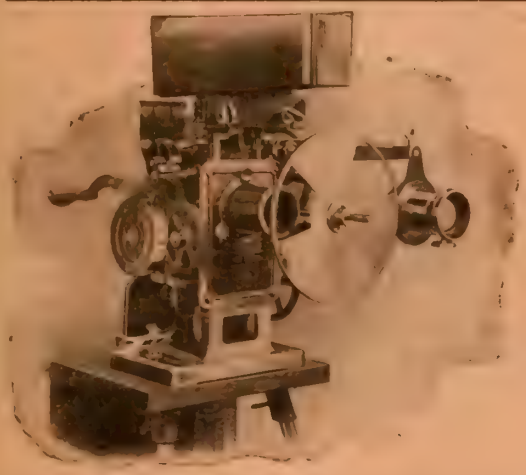
Another Territory Conquered :: Europe Surrenders to

Power's Cameragraph No. 6



THE return of our Vice-President from Europe marks the introduction of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6 into the European market on an unprecedented scale.

Negotiations with European houses desiring the agency have been under way for nearly a year, but the physical impossibility of producing a sufficient number of machines to meet the home demand prevented the establishment of foreign agencies until this time.

Recent increases in manufacturing facilities have placed us in a position to accept foreign business, and our Vice-President accordingly visited Europe in October to conclude the long pending agency negotiations.

After careful consideration of the applications of a large number of houses for the "POWER'S" agency, the following agents were appointed:

AGENTS FOR GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND:
THE WALTURDAW CO. - - - London

AGENTS FOR CONTINENTAL EUROPE:
THE DEUTSCHE VITASCOPE CO., Berlin, Germany

These houses are leaders in their respective territories and their desire for the "POWER'S" agency is another strong testimony to the merits of POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6, in which they have shown their confidence by placing initial orders for one hundred and fifty No. 6 Cameragraphs.

These are the largest European orders ever placed for American moving picture machines, and they mark the recognition abroad (as well as at home) of the superiority over all other machines of

"We hammer away on QUALITY always, because QUALITY is the salvation of the moving picture business!"

We are going to release an Imp on Monday, December 5th which we believe is the smartest comedy we have ever made—even better than "Fruit and Flowers"—and you remember what a whirlwind that one was. The new release deals with Gerald and Percy who first attempt to become great emotional actors and then enlist in the army. Their troubles lead to a terrifically funny climax in which they are clothed in nothing but barrels. If you want this Imp, which we say again is funnier than any we ever made, tell your exchange to send you the

"ASPIRATIONS OF GERALD AND PERCY"

(Released December 5th)

After that, on Thursday, December 8th comes a magnificent newspaper drama. The scenario was written by a newspaper man who knows the game from printer's devil to managing editor. When you run this Imp, invite the newspaper men in your city to attend a special performance for their benefit. They will be keenly interested and will have more respect for moving pictures thereafter. The title of this release is

"TWIXT LOYALTY AND LOVE"

(Released December 8th)

Are you doing your share toward getting TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK? Hundreds of exhibitors by constantly ding-donging at their exchanges have compelled them to furnish two Imps every week. You can do the same thing if you will only keep everlastingly at it. No exchange on earth can ignore the concerted demands of wide-awake exhibitors! Get what you are paying for!

KEAN

OR THE PRINCE AND THE ACTOR

Adapted from the play by Alexander Dumas

A magnificent production showing the striking personality of Edmund Kean, the famous tragedian, who was not only a great actor but an intensely human man, and the merit of this film is that it presents in a series of vivid pictures both the idolized actor and the popular man. The film is remarkable for its gorgeous and brilliant scenes. The acting is of the highest possible order, being superbly executed by actors of of the Royal Theatre at Copenhagen.

I have been in the M. P. Biz from its infancy up to now. I have been experimenting on a coating for M. P. Curtains that would give that soft silvery effect so much desired. At last I have discovered a preparation that I consider far superior to anything yet offered to the M. P. Mgrs. It cuts the yellow out of the light. It gives true sky lines, light and shadow. The actors have that life like appearance so greatly desired, It cuts out those reflecting rays which are so harmful to the eyes. Lasts longer, and above all costs less. Upon appointment, we make private demonstrations at Allentown, Pa, or at our New York City office, 516 Fith Avenue, corner 43rd Street.

THE WEARING QUALITY of a Motion Picture Machine is next in importance to Quality of Pictures. Nothing is more annoying than a break-down and that's what you're liable to get where the wearing quality has not been demonstrated by years of service.

G. B. JONES, of Lawrence, Kans., says Nov. 6, 1910.
"The Motiograph is a strictly superior machine. Its main beauty is that it is dependable. I have never had a break-down with a Motiograph.

The MOTIOGRAPH gives the best pictures and the greatest DURABILITY, and requires the least attention.

The life of a motion picture machine for electrical theatre work has been estimated at two years. Motiographs, after three years of steady, constant grind, are considered by the owners practically good as new. They have solid steel wheels, tool steel shafts, phosphor bronze bushings.

Motiograph pictures are known for their brilliancy, steadiness and freedom from flicker.

The patented double cone shutter is largely reponsible.

NOTICE.

The new Western offices of the Moving Picture World, Rooms 307-309, Post building, 160 Washington street, Chicago, are now ready to receive World readers visiting Chicago. Mr. John M. Bradlet, Western representative of the World, will extend to every one a cordial welcome. They will find a complete file of manufacturers' catalogues and a bureau of information on films, theater construction, materials and supplies. They will also find desks and stationery for their correspondence, the services of a lady stenographer and a polite messenger boy to act as their guide or go their errands. We invite every exhibitor or person interested in motion pictures to make our Western office their headquarters when visiting Chicago.

Patent Reissue No. 12,037, 1902

Obedient to the behest of his employers, the editor of the Patent Company's house organ, "The Film Index," prints an article in the November 26 number of that publication headed: "Getting After the Picture Pirates." Mr. Hoff admits that the legal branches of the Patents Company have been "sawing wood and saying nothing for some time." Mr. Hoff knows very well that so long as the $2 per, from bamboozled exhibitors, come in with reasonable regularity; so long as the licensed exhibitors grudgingly pay their royalties into the coffers of the 80 Fifth avenue establishment, there is no occasion for the Patents Company lawyers to do anything but "saw wood and say nothing."

But diminishing sales by some of these deluded licensed picture makers have, of course, made them restive, and so the Patents Company lawyers are forced to do something in order to keep the licensed manufacturers quiet. The licensed manufacturers were persuaded to pay tribute to the Edison-Patents Company on the understanding, if not the pledge, that they would practically have a monopoly. This they are far from enjoying. Fifteen Independent manufacturers are having a cut in, and a very good cut in, too. The licensed manufacturers, therefore, are paying their royalties for practically nothing, while, at the same time, they are watching their sales diminish.

The trust charter, which was referred to in these pages last week, quotes no less than fifteen patents which the Patents Company hold. If we are to believe "The Film Index," these patents are not worth a rap. You never hear of infringements of them. You never hear of trouble arising over the Latham loop or the Albert Smith winding reel, etc., etc. "The Film Index" virtually tells us why these things amount to nothing at all. To quote "The Index," "Suits have been commenced in several instances for the infringements of the Edison camera patent, reissue No. 12,037, 1902." Only this and nothing more!

All sorts of threats are printed by Mr. Hoff against Herbert Miles, William Steiner, C. V. Henkel and Joe Miles. Mark Dintenfass is said to be "in danger." As for the "Kessel-Baumann crowd," whom Mr. Hoff politely calls "a combination of pirates"—well, we do not know what is likely to happen to them. To quote W. S. Gilbert: "Something hot with boiling oil in it," we suppose.

Mr. Hoff is not to be blamed or chided for writing what he writes. He has to write what he is told to write by his employers at 80 Fifth avenue. But it is good at any rate to have an issue clearly defined. It is good to have it established once and for all that patent reissue 12,037, 1902, is the only raison d'etre of the Patents Company, "The Film Index," the "licensed" side of moving picture making in the United States and of Mr. Edison's claims to having invented moving pictures.

"Patent reissue No. 12,037, 1902," is a menace to the moving picture business of the world. In the interests of progress, in the interests of freedom of trade, it should be enforced or the bubble burst. Meanwhile it is the duty of the Independents to fight it by every legitimate means. An obvious course is to render it nugatory. There are available at this moment cameras for taking moving pictures which get around "patent reissue No. 12,037." Why do not all the Independent manufacturers provide themselves with and openly use these cameras, and at least clear themselves of the charge of being "pirates and freebooters?" It would, perhaps, please the Patents Company lawyers who could keep on "sawing wood" with the back of the saw while they whistle the familiar air: "Every Little Bit Added to What You've Got Makes Just a Little Bit More."

We shall have some more to say about patent reissue No. 12,037, 1902, in succeeding issues.

Moving Picture Exhibition a Profession.

In that upward and onward march, which has been so often spoken of in these columns, it daily becomes more evident that the exhibitor of moving pictures will become a man of great importance and only those worthy will be able to "fill the bill." Catering to the demands of an enlightened public requires most singular ability; a deep and thorough knowledge of human nature and human needs will be imperative.

Public taste and public morals will also have to be most keenly discerned by everyone seeking to be a caterer to the people's whims and pleasures; also a thorough insight of the requirements of those laws and rules which govern society for the public good. That a good education must be the foundation needs only to be mentioned as a requirement, it is the basis of all intellectual occupations. Already the cheap and incompetent man is proving that he has "had his day," bringing with his limited intelligence the common and the vulgar he finds the "business" growing away from him; he is left stranded on those reefs where lie so many of his kind while "the moving pictures are moving up."

The making of films has now become a great problem. Artists of the highest order are the actors and actresses producing the plays, photographers of ability only are able to reproduce the same. Men of business training and capacity have commercialized the work so that today this part of the moving picture business is a staple industry, employing thousands of professionals and capable citizens. Following these the man who stands between the producers and the public must necessarily be of a higher order than formerly. Happily the "learn the picture business" for a few dollars and "position guaranteed" is no more. Those were days when to be associated with the nickelodeon was not beneficial to one's standing in the community; under the new order of things no one need be ashamed of being connected with this new form of amusement and education, as before very long it will attract and require the same preparation as many other commercial and professional careers.

"He loveth most who loveth best all things both great and small." This quotation from "The Ancient Mariner," by Samuel Taylor Coleridge, is often given as an instance of a poet crystallizing the sentiment of human affection towards the animal kingdom. In this sentiment the poets find a fertile theme for their fantasies. One of the many statues of Lord Byron, the poet, shows him as having the effigy of a dog at his feet. The inscription is a quotation from one of his poems on friendship. Of friends, he says, "I only had but one, and here he lies."

The dog and the horse dispute primacy as the friend of man. Most of us are animal lovers. We who write this confess to be lovers of cats, dogs and horses. It will probably surprise and interest the reader to know that round about Twenty-third street, where we are writing this article, we have many dog friends, cat friends and occasionally make a friend of a horse. The other day we were standing on the curb of Twenty-third street looking towards the entrance of this office. We held in our hands some candies that we had just bought. As we stood, we were conscious of something soft rubbing against our hands. Turning, we saw a very beautiful horse who in his undemonstrative equine way was asking us for one of the candies clenched in our fist. Of course we gave the animal one and he seemed pleased. He went on his way presumably rejoicing and accompanied by the smiles of the man in the Lord & Taylor conveyance which he drew.

We have long perceived that the animal is very popular in the moving picture. This is as it should be. There can be nothing very seriously wrong with the man, woman or child who is generally fond of animals. You mostly find that a "dog-man," for example, is a decent sort of man in other ways. This little rule will apply all round. The Pathe people, over in Paris, have a very clever dog who shows surprising intelligence in the work that he has to do. That dog has won tremendous applause for his work. And really, as he poses before the camera at the conclusion of a picture, he seems conscious of the successful part he has borne in making the picture. It is safe to say that that dog has won the love of millions.

More recently the Vitagraph Company have come to the front with dog pictures. A very beautiful collie has figured in several of them. One of these pictures represents the seashore adventures and misadventures of a young couple who were practically brought together by the intelligence of this handsome collie, who unconsciously was the bearer of love messages between them. This beautiful creature acted with as much charm and intelligence, it seemed to us, as any human being. He is and was immensely popular with moving picture audiences, especially the children.

Of course, animal work in pictures is not confined to dogs. The horse often plays a conspicuous part in them. There is no finer subject for moving picture treatment than a horse race. Pathe and other firms have done this sort of thing wonderfully well. Then you have the draught house, the carriage horse and the trick horse; most popular of all, however, is the horse which shows his affection for his master or mistress in the characteristic way of the animal.

Mr. Selig has made a specialty of less domesticated animals than the horse and the dog. Out there, in his great Chicago field, he keeps bears for moving picture purposes. If we remember aright the elephant has figured in a Selig picture. Then, the Selig lion has played a conspicuous part in the Roosevelt pictures. The skin of that noble animal now adorns the Selig sanctum in Chicago.

Of course the cowboy, the bucking broncho, the Buffalo Bill, the Wild West subjects generally, give opportunity for the inclusion of the horse in great variety. Recently Mr. Kearton showed us wild hippopotamii and real lions. And chiefest popularity amongst the little ones attaches, we have noticed, to Zoological Park studies on the screen.

These discursive reminders, then, will inform the reader how very large a part the animal plays in the modern moving picture. Speaking generally, we cannot have too much of him. Our friend, Pat Powers, is also evidently of the same opinion. He has gone and purchased the white horse on which Maude Adams rode in her play "Joan of Arc." Shrewd Mr. Powers knows that this white horse will look good in a picture and will be popular with moving picture audiences.

If we were to take a census of moving picture theatergoers in this country, we would not be surprised to find that the most popular pictures were those in which animals figured. Observation shows us that they always attract and hold attention. People do not yawn over animal pictures. They do not rise and go out. This is a hint to manufacturers and exhibitors, namely, to make good animal pictures and have them featured.

Besides amusing us, of course, these animal pictures keep us familiar with the aspects of wild and domestic animal life. The animal is always popular in the picture for this reason that the animal has all the capabilities of a human being for showing traits of intelligence, comedy, resource, cleverness—he is, in fact, often very human, doing things in his way which we mortals do in our way.

Exhibitors and others complain in our columns that they cannot get enough of good scenic pictures, or enough of good comedies; they have too many dramas: the pictures generally are not good enough, etc. But we never hear them say that they get too many animal pictures. Probably, if the truth were known, they could do with more. So we throw out this hint to the manufacturer that good animal pictures always please the women and children as well as interest the men. They cannot possibly evoke unfavorable criticism; at any rate, they do not. The animal kingdom will, we hope, long continue to interest moving picture theatergoers.

The Costume Play.

The points of resemblance between the moving picture stage and the ordinary stage outnumber the points of difference. We refer of course to the formulæ adopted for the preparation of the picture plays. Or rather, we should say their respective classification. On the ordinary stage you have comedy, drama, farce, burlesque, costume pieces, etc. You have all these on the moving picture screen. There are many tastes to be catered for. You cannot please everybody in any business, but you can, at any rate, split up your public into so many sections and cater for those sections to the best of your ability. Thus, amongst ordinary theatergoers, there are those who patronize drama, Shakespeare, comedy, individual authors, etc. A glance down the advertisements of the newspapers will show that the theater managers who, after all, are merely business men, first, last and all the time, endeavor to satisfy these various sections of the public to the best of their abilities.

The film manufacturers are confronted by the same problem. Probably they are solving that problem as well as might be expected, considering the youth and still primitive nature of the film business. There is evidently a large public in the moving picture field for the costume play. And amongst the companies wisely catering for this element is the Vitagraph Company, whose reputation for the gorgeousness of their productions is increasing by leaps and bounds. Since last year this company has very notably advanced in the production of fine costume and spectacular pieces. We recall with pleasure "A Midsummer Night's Dream," their "Mona" series, their "Elektra," their "Becket" and other masterly subjects. More recently we saw a type of their costume work in "Francesca Da Rimini," a subject which they had already treated some time ago. The impression made on our minds by this picture is that of an appreciation of the marvelous Venetian magnificence set forth in this film. Architecture, scenery, groupings, costumes all appealed to us with such wonderful realism that when looking at the picture, we seemed to be conscious of watching the play of real life and passion in Venetian times. With what distinction the characters on the screen acted and how wonderfully naturally they wore their imposing robes.

The story is tolerably familiar to all. It is that of the forced marriage of a beautiful girl with an ugly man and the natural bestowal of her ante-nuptial affection on a handsomer man. The lovers are finally killed by lightning just as they are discovered by the deformed husband. This scheme has been worked out on the regular stage many times, and never fails to attract. The full story is printed on page 1,248 of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD for November 26.

Our present purpose is to regard the film as a magnificent representation of Italian court life and character worked out in the modern and prosaic atmosphere of Long Island. It is certainly a tribute to the skill of the Vitagraph Company that they can produce such a masterly illusion. One little fact lingers in our memory. It is the splendid manner in which Miss Turner wore her elegant costumes, comporting herself all through the picture like a veritable noble lady of quality. So with the other characters. These well-drilled, well-dressed, well-costumed Vitagraph actresses and actors, as in "Becket" and other notable Vitagraph productions, had thoroughly grasped the sentiment of the story, and did their work in a manner which would have been creditable to them had they appeared on the stage of the New Theater, New York City.

Plays of this kind will always be popular with a large section of the moving picture public, who like simplicity of story combined with grandoise acting, archæological exactitude and sumptuous magnificence in the way of scenery, furniture, costumes and the like. The love of the magnificent is inherent in all of us, though the limitations of our opportunities may interpose barriers to our enjoyment and appreciation of it.

DEATH OF N. H. BROWN.

We very much regret to announce the death of N. Howland Brown, vice-president of the Williams, Brown & Earle Company, of 918 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, which occurred on Thursday, November the 17th, from heart disease. Mr. Brown's death comes as something of a shock, as the last time we saw him in this office he appeared to be in the best of health, and, being comparatively speaking a young man, it was reasonable to anticipate many years of activity before him. For the last two years the Williams, Brown and Earle Company have not occupied a prominent position in the film world, but at one time they did a considerable business with imported films. They relinquished this line on the formation of the Patents Company. In the optical and photographic lines, however, Williams, Brown & Earle were and are exceedingly prominent. Mr. Brown's death will be regretted by many men in the moving picture field and we offer to his surviving relatives and partners our sincere sympathy in his loss.

"Edison: His Life and Inventions." *

A Review by Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

[Second and Concluding Article.]

* "Edison: His Life and Inventions," by Frank Lewis Dyer, General Counsel for the Edison Laboratory and allied interests, and Thomas Commerford Martin, ex-president of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. Two volumes, illustrated, price $4.00. (New York and London: Harper Brothers.)

We concluded our first review of this book last week, with the promise to devote some little attention to Chapter 21, which consists of about twenty pages. According to our authors, this chapter is perhaps "as significant as any in this biography, because it presents Mr. Edison as the master impresario of his age."!! If it is so significant, why is it so short and unspecific, as we shall proceed to demonstrate that it is? The "master impresario of his age" has, it seems, in virtue of "his phonograph and his (sic) motion picture, more audiences in a week than the theaters in America in a year." His phonographs we will, for the sake of expediency, concede; but his motion pictures? Really, Mr. Edison's biographers are allowing their hero worship to carry them into the domain of exaggeration.

His motion pictures? Mr. Thomas Alva Edison had, as far as we can discover, a very nebulous connection indeed with the origin and development of the motion picture. One of our authorities for this is Mr. Frank Lewis Dyer himself, who in the pages of this journal for December 21, 1907, credits Mr. Edison simply with being "the first, according to a judicial decision (our italics), to make a motion picture camera, using a single lens and with a single film, wherein the film is brought to rest and so maintained during each exposure, and is moved forward during each period of non-exposure, the movements being sufficiently rapid to secure the desired number of photographs per second, and the mechanism being of such a character that the photographs shall be uniform and sharp and shall not require cutting up and rearrangement prior to printing." So much for Mr. Dyer on December 21, 1907. Now, in November, 1910, this judicial decision on a disputed patent, makes Mr. Edison, according to Mr. Dyer, the "master impresario of his age." Loyal if indiscreet! Then again: "The nickelodeon is the central factor in modern amusement and Mr. Edison founded it." Are we supposed to believe so? And this: "All that millions know of music and drama he furnishes." Rather broad claim, is it not? A very considerable number of the civilized community would be glad if the phonograph had never been invented.

Before us as we write this review is the Edison "Kinetogram" for November 22, 1910. This house organ, issued with the knowledge of Mr. Dyer, refers to Thomas Alva Edison, "to whom the world owes the moving picture idea." On Page 530, Volume 2 of his book, Mr. Dyer says: "Its real birth was a century earlier." Of course he refers to Plateau, who enunciated the theory of the persistence of vision. If anybody deserves credit in this connection it is Plateau, not Edison. Mr. Edison may have adapted and patented much; he has discovered little. He certainly is not generally credited with, nor does he, in his interviews, claim to possess, inventive genius. The first record of a moving picture having been made on rollable celluloid is that of Friese Greene, an Englishman, who in June, 1890, at Chester, England, showed a camera for taking a series of photographs in rapid succession. We, who write this, have seen those photographs. According to Mr. Dyer, Mr. Edison did not make application for his patent until August 24, 1891. It was not issued until August 31, 1897. It was re-issued on September 30, 1902. On mere chronology, therefore, Edison is right out of it. He was antedated by Greene. He has been antedated by others. These facts dispose of the claims made in his behalf in this book to be the founder of the nickelodeon and the inventor of the moving picture idea. "It is all one piece of sober, careful analysis, and stubborn successful attack on the problem." (Vol. 2, Page 528.) Nothing of the sort. Mr. Dyer, in December, 1907, tells us it was a question of patent claims and patent litigation only. Tempora nos mutantur!

We are disappointed with this motion picture chapter in the book about "Edison: His Life and Inventions." It is so painfully sketchy, slight and unspecific. "An idea occurs to Edison in the year 1887." We are not told how that idea was worked out, or if it was worked out. "An experimental camera was made taking 48 pictures a second." Why this was done we are not told. It contradicts theory. In 1889, we are told, he "saw that rollable celluloid was a product which would help him." Flexible supports for photographic work were known long before rollable celluloid was made. And rollable celluloid was not invented at Rochester. However, we have it on the authority of this book that a camera was made in the year 1889, yet it was not protected by patent until August, 1891, nor was the patent issued until August 31, 1897. Why?

This latter date is of considerable significance. In 1895 Lumiere, in Paris and London, quite without reference to Edison, was showing magnificent pictures on the screen; it was not until after the French and English manufacturers had got very busy that patent No. 12,192 acquired any commercial value. Comment is superfluous. By all means let Mr. Edison have every credit for his ingenuity as a patentee, but do, please, let us hear the last of him being assigned the credit of "giving the world the moving picture idea," of being "the founder of the nickelodeon," of being "the master impresario of his age" in virtue of his moving pictures. Edison is not entitled to these distinctions.

We have at hand, as we write this review, one of the most valuable books ever issued in connection with the moving picture. This is Hopwood's "Living Pictures." He, of course, means moving pictures. Mr. Hopwood, we may say, was, and probably is, an official of the British Patent Office. In his volume he gives a fine history of the moving picture from all its aspects. He points out that the first intimation of Edison's work in moving picture cameras did not reach England until May, 1891. This was a year after Greene's publication of his work. Hopwood, too, expresses astonishment that the Edison patent should have been concealed from public view for six years. The document covers the celebrated adjudicated patent and the perforated film. It certainly was a remarkable concealment.

Chapter 21 in the Edison book concludes with the following pious aspiration: "Let us not think too lightly of the humble five-cent theater with its gaping crowds following with breathless interest the vicissitudes of the beautiful heroine." Brothers, let us think all we can of the humble five-cent theater with its gaping crowds. It is this gaping crowd which indirectly pays Mr. Thomas

Alva Edison, the owner of United States Patent No. 12,037-8 of 1902, exceedingly handsome royalties, which supplies the Motion Picture Patents Company, of 80 Fifth avenue, with their beautiful and palatial offices. It is the humble five-cent theater and the gaping crowd which renders the business of Licensed and Independent manufacturers possible, which is responsible for the existence of tens of thousands of theaters in this country and the daily presence of millions of people in those theaters. But that to any one man now living should be assigned the credit for all this, as well as a large share of the profits, is so preposterous that we enter an emphatic protest against the further promulgation of the fiction. If we remember aright, in the famous judicial decision upon which so much stress is laid by the Edison people, the Judge expressly said that Edison could not be allowed many of the claims that were made on his behalf.

We ought, in conclusion, to say that aside from this unfortunate moving picture chapter, Mr. Edison's biographers have produced a very readable book. It is the sort of thing which may be calculated to act as a stimulant and an incentive to the young American mind. Mr. Edison has "got there." He has made a name and has made money, which is all the American mind seems to care for just now. But with all his fame, wealth and success, Mr. Edison has failed conspicuously in one thing, namely, to invent the moving picture. The book is well printed and bound; has many portraits and other illustrations, and no doubt will be widely read in virtue of the interest—the deserved interest—attaching to Mr. Edison's picturesque personality.

Picture Personalities.

Miss Pearl White.

Pearl White is rapidly making a great name for herself in the moving picture field. We have watched her progress and her work with considerable pleasure. Last week in these pages she was complimented upon her impersonation of Mercy Merrick, in "The New Magdalene." This week, too, her name and personality are in our minds in writing of an imminent Powers release, "When the World Sleeps." In this play Miss White enacts the part of a lady walking in her sleep and does it, to our thinking, perfectly. She is evidently an emotional actress of great intensity.

Emotional actresses on the moving picture stage are none too plentiful. You have any number of women who can look pretty and wear nice clothes, but not so many who can get the deeper emotions over into the auditorium. Miss White is a handsome girl and popular with the Powers Company and all those who meet her. The daughter of a well-known actress, she has played every part from Topsy and Little Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" up to Juliet.

Asked what line of characters she prefers, Miss White said, "I am told that I should devote myself to emotional work. I enjoy playing comedy parts. But then I am very happy when acting any part. The motion picture appeals to me because of the variety of characters I am called on to play, the frequent changes, the delightful outdoor work with the exhilarating rides, etc. I am happy in working under a director. Mr. Golden contents himself with explaining the nature and main characteristics of the character that I am to portray and her relations to the story and then permits me to express myself freely. My motion picture experiences have been valuable to me in developing my capacity for expressing emotion independent of the spoken word. I now realize how the actors in the theater are, except in the great plays, handicapped by the dialogue, the artificial scenery and other limitations."

Miss White, we are convinced, has a great future before her. Popular and excellent as it is at the present time, the Powers picture is destined to occupy even a more prominent position in the public eye than it does at present. Our friend, P. A. Powers tells us this himself, and Mr. Powers knows, of course. So as the Powers picture progresses, Miss White's opportunties will also increase. We predict for her international renown as a moving picture play actress.

The Vitagraph Company is producing the portrayal of "The Last of the Mohicans" by J. Fenimore Cooper. The dramatic situations and the scenic suggestions of this work is an inspiration that should lead to great results. This standard and historical story of the early settlers and the aborigines, the original native Indians, will have a value and interest which has never been seen by the present generation.

Fred Smith, for some months Manager Dechert's assistant at the Bijou, has taken charge of the Auditorium at Fort Lee. Samuel Shaw, of Ridgefield Park, is the capitalist back of this venture. The theater will be open every afternoon and evening and Sundays.

When Mr. Smith left the Bijou the employees united in presenting him with a fitting testimonial of the esteem in which they held him.

North Brookfield, Mass.—The Old Union Church here is being remodeled and will be opened on December 1 as a first-class moving picture theater with a seating capacity of 800. Up-to-date equipment is being installed. It will be known as the Star Theater and will be under the personal direction of Jos. Berthiaume, of Spencer, Mass.

THE PICTURE IN THE CHURCH.

Through the courtesy of Messrs. McMahan & Jackson, proprietors of the Cincinnati Film Exchange, we are enabled to print the portrait of the Rev. Mr. Schribly, pastor of the Grace M. E. Church, Newport, Ky. The Rev. Schribly is a staunch friend of moving pictures and frequently calls upon Messrs. McMahan & Jackson to furnish him with a suitable program for an evening's entertainment in his church. We append a few introductory remarks he made at one of these entertainments because they voice the sentiment of the Rev. Schribly in regard to the potent power of the moving picture for good. His words have the ring of a stalwart leader who will leave the world better for his having lived therein, unlike the carping critic who can only look at the seamy side of life.

(The Rev. Dr. Schribly Says.)

Before we show the film I have a few words that I would like to say to you. What wonders God has wrought! This evening we are going to enjoy one of the greatest discoveries of the century, that of the moving picture films. Now I know how many people feel in regard to the moving picture business, and I believe that in some instances their thought is justified, but in my opinion the phonograph and moving picture machine belong to the greatest inventions of the past century.

There is a picture of a man in the film I have now in my hands who is going to take four steps. In order to reproduce that man going four steps they had to take fifty-one pictures of him and the machine had to be operated at a certain speed to make each impression distinct before it was reproduced; after that film is made and developed we have only the negative, and the positive has to be made off of the film and must again be placed in a machine and run at the same speed it was run before, and we have the picture that is given on the screen.

In the next twenty-five years moving pictures will not only be used at entertainments and theaters, but in universities, and in the near future will do a great work along the educational line. I believe that we are on the threshold of a great revolution in the near future, all objectionable features will be eliminated, and I believe that the good manufacturers ought to be encouraged, for I have the pleasure of stating to you that I believe it is the greatest art ever given to the world.

THE NATIONAL FILM MANUFACTURING AND LEASING COMPANY.

Since the publication last week of our article on "Finance and the Film," we have had an interview with one of the gentlemen who is actively engaged in the formation of the National Film Manufacturing and Leasing Company. From him we were able to learn, and indeed satisfied ourselves, that so far from being merely a financial scheme, the National Company is a sound business proposition. It is the intention of the company when formed to place moving pictures of a novel kind before the public. Moreover, capital is available for the preliminary work of organization which includes the acquisition of existing factories and the prosecution of the business of making moving pictures in a systematic and thorough manner. The proposed operations of the company, as we understand them, are perfectly legitimate and do not merit the unfavorable criticisms that have been directed at them from various quarters. So soon as we have other data in connection with this company we will apprise our readers.

"GOUNOD'S 'AVE MARIA.'"

An Ambrosio Feature Release.

Oh! for an open market. If only the policies advocated by J. W. Jennings were in effect now, the silent drama would receive a "boost" that would place it far out of the reach of criticism. If every exhibitor in this broad land of ours could only show "Gounod's 'Ave Maria,'" the clergy, instead of condemning, would praise, the public press would support instead of agitating, and the "scoffers would remain to pray." Take for instance: If the Orpheum of Chicago, the Casino of St. Louis, or the Majestic of Memphis could show some of the wonderful Independent releases, and enhance them with appropriate music by their celebrated orchestras, or if some of the splendid Independent theaters could do the same with some of the really good Licensed releases, wouldn't such a condition tend to improve and elevate the industry quicker and far more successfully than anything that is now being done in the "elevation" line? When will our fondest hopes be realized?

I like Ambrosio releases and thoroughly enjoy the opportunity of seeing them on the screen. Three weeks ago I rode far out in the suburbs just to see "The Slave of Carthage" a second time; yesterday I saw the "Ave Maria" in an exchange exhibition room, and I would give a great deal to have the pleasure and satisfaction of seeing it again in some theater or other, a la Orpheum, with appropriate music.

Beautiful, beautiful, I repeat over and over in my mind, but that is as far as I can go; words fail me to describe this wonderful picture. "Stirred by the sweet music of the violin in the church, Elsie, an invalid, secures an introduction to the musician, who falls in love with her. Complying with her childish whim, he takes her on the lake and plays for the enraptured girl. The escapade is disastrous, for the chill sea air hastens her end, and her dying request is to hear once more the beautiful strains of Gounod's "Ave Maria." The heartbroken musician, unable to bear the loss of the one he loves, ends his life in the sea."

Why don't some of our American manufacturers and producers put out more work of this high standard? This story is an excellent one, but the chances are that put out by some other producer it would have fallen flat. The setting, the detail, the photography, the acting, all are superb. In the first place, the violinist is a musician, not a mere fiddler, and above all, a finished actor. The tender sentiment portrayed throughout the picture impresses you as being sincere, right from the heart; the acting is just as it should be, no premeditated situations, every action on the part of Elsie being spontaneous, resulting from the emotion inspired by the violinist's playing, and on his part created by his love for her.

Enraptured, she requests him regardless of her physician's advice, to take her out on the lake and again play for her the beautiful melody which had been the means of their acquaintance after his rendition of it the first time in the church. The escapade is disastrous, for the chill sea wind aggravates the illness which causes her untimely death, and her dying request is to hear once more "Ave Maria." The heartbroken musician, unable to bear the loss of the one he loves, floats out to sea in a boat, playing his violin in fond remembrance of her, and overcome with sorrow, he ends his life by falling into the water.

As said above, the production in its entirety was superb. In one scene, where the musician is shown reading the note from Elsie, the light and shade effect is wonderful, a detail that would ordinarily have been overlooked by the average producer, is made a very pleasing feature in this scene. And what could be more appropriate than the "Ave Maria" (pray for us) for an invalid to desire to hear, above all other music? And the little details, such as the violinist tuning his violin before serenading his lady fair, reflect great credit on the producers and actors in the picture.

Here is another excellent point: The story was not drawn out to make the everlasting "1,000 feet." It runs about 500 feet, thereby obviating the necessity of working in a lot of useless by-play and unnecessary situations. Even after the death of Elsie the musician does not rave and tear his hair, as is so often the case in many productions his grief is too sincere to permit of any wild demonstrations, he floats slowly out to sea, and without any display of a struggle or feeling of regret at the step he is about to take, ends his life by falling into the water.

I would venture to say that this picture, shown in connection with proper music, will bring tears to the eyes of any audience. It is a sad story, but handled so deftly that its sadness is sweet. It touches the heart. J. C. K.

A few evenings ago I chanced to drop into a hotel not a mile from the intersection of Forty-second street and Broadway and it was my fortune, or misfortune, to land in the company of a film manufacturer, an exchange owner and an exhibitor. I was known to but one of the party, but soon became known to all, and gradually drifted into the spirit of the discussion that was temporarily suspended upon my arrival. The subject of debate was "Who Is Who?" A queer topic, but nevertheless a good one. The translation is, "Who Is Responsible?" In order that the Motion Picture World reader may gain admittance to the ground floor I will give, as briefly as possible, the facts discussed. Who is responsible for the condition of films?

As I have already stated, I found a representative each of the manufacturer, the renter, and the exhibitor engaged in debate. The exhibitor was blaming the renter for giving him scratched and torn film; the renter was deftly throwing the blame upon the manufacturer, claiming he had been given a film that was not absolutely new, but which had been used as a test on the machine where the productions originate.

* * *

Although not so closely identified with either one of the moving picture branches, I took a chance and jumped into the argument. First I listened to the others and, in brief, this is what they said: The Exhibitor—"You know I pay a good price for my service and the price I am paying entitles me to the best you have on your shelves, but you sacrifice me to hold some new customer, and I get the next best you can give me. I'll not stand for it. If I want scratched stuff I can get it at a far lower price than I am paying you."

The renter says: "The film you speak of was absolutely new. It had not been out of our office, or run upon a single machine in our office, and I will take an oath that you received it as we did. When you made the kick I called the manufacturer to account. He told me the film was perfect. He is here now and you may talk to him."

* * *

The manufacturer: "Yes, I remember the day Mr. X called me up on the telephone and told me that on account of the scratched condition of the film he was in danger of losing a first-run customer. I investigated the matter and found that when the film left our hands it was all right."

* * *

There was a case of "Buffalo." Everybody was positive. Each looked upon the other as the most despised Ananias that ever provoked the temper of the big oyster of Oyster Bay. "Don't come no 'con' game on me," exclaimed the exhibitor. "I've been up against that before. I paid a nice little bill one time on that. You gave me what you called a new film. It had never been out of the wrappings when I got it, but when it got back into your hands you raised a cry that would have shaken the foundations of Tammany Hall and told me you could not afford to pay for a film for my exclusive use. Do you remember what we agreed upon? Yes, I guess you do. You were to send the film back to the manufacturer and have him decide who was the guilty party. You did so, and showed me the answer. I was the goat, and I paid you like a man, didn't I? I paid you without a murmur, didn't I?"

"Yes," replied the renter, "you were game, but you don't think for a moment I would saddle anything upon you that I did not think you should carry. I put the thing up where I thought it belonged, and the referee decided against you. That let me out, didn't it?"

At this point I interposed. "Gentlemen," said I, "what did the manufacturer decide?" The answer was quick and decisive: "Why, the scratches and breaks were due to the projecting machine, which evidently was an object of carelessness—the operator was the guilty person. If his machine was not in need of repair he must have dropped it clean. Some particle of dust or something had scraped the film."

Before I could intervene the exhibitor, with no little display of temper shouted: "Don't come no 'con' game with that. I paid one bill on the dust game, but I'll not pay another. That last film I returned was sent up to me or my operator, because I have insisted that his machine be perfectly clean before he starts, and I am there to see that it is." The renter then retorted: "I'll swear that, even had we run the film on our machine, it could not be hurt by us, so it lies between you and the man who gave the film to us."

It can readily be seen that such an argument might continue indefinitely without the injection of some new fact. Fortunately, an idea occurred to me, and as a mutual friend, I gave expression to it, prefacing my theory with the query as to the possible guilt of the operator. Of course, the exhibitor promptly resented such a suggestion. I then said that possibly the operator of the renter was at fault and brought the most pronounced expression of scorn upon my humble head.

* * *

I was really in a critical position. The only party to the listening trio that smiled upon me was the manufacturer. He was the only one who apparently gave me credit for having common-sense. I felt flattered and asked, "Gentlemen, is it a fact that uncleanliness, reckless grinding, or bad joints made upon the scene, are the only causes for the condition of films as they are so frequently returned to the renters?"

* * *

Well, you should have seen the facial expressions of that renter and exhibitor. It seemed to me that I was an object of—not scorn, but heartfelt pity. They seemed pained that I should know so little about the business. As the exhibitor looked upon me I could almost feel his feelings. I could read his mind. He seemed to be thinking, "That fellow is too dense to live." However, I summoned courage and asked, "What is your answer?" The manufacturer evaded the question by calling upon the waiter to bring another drink. The other two looked upon the whole thing as too foolish for a circus ring. I am confident that if the waiter was not on the job I would have been abandoned with much less ceremony than Wellman and his wise crew left the airship some hundreds of miles from the course it was supposed to be following.

To bring off the climax, the exhibitor said, with no little display of arrogance and a pronounced tinge of resentment: "Tell us what you know, or think, or think you think. Enlighten us with your profound thought, you dummy. Perhaps you may convince us that we do not know anything about the business. Come on, you sublime condensor of troubles, we may need you yet."

* * *

To tell the truth, I felt like a cat thrown into a millpond. Not even a glance at the beaming countenance of the manufacturer could revive my spirits. But I was convinced I was right. I took one long breath, I glanced one look of defiance, and then relieved myself of this: "Gentlemen, I have put a fair and square question before you, one that in nine out of ten cases would have brought forth an affirmative answer, while the true one is in the negative. In a great many cases the condition of the films is not the fault of either the manufacturer, the renter, or the exhibitor, nor to the willful neglect of the operator, but to the ignorance of the operator of the great importance of keeping the film in true line between the upper and the lower magazine boxes. More than three-quarters of the troubles come from improper alignment."

"Drink up!" said one of the party with apparent unconcern, but it was apparent that my point had not escaped attention.

CONSTRUCTION DECORATIONS

BY JOHN M. BRADLET.

The Screen and the Colors of the Walls.

The appearance on the market of the mirror screen has aroused the attention of the exhibitor and showed to him that the projection of a picture on a white sheet or canvas will bring out the finest details of the picture. A new invention is always the source of many imitations, and while inventors kick themselves for having missed the chance of presenting the first improved curtain for motion pictures, they nevertheless jump in the fray with all sorts of improvements.

As the exhibitors are questioning themselves to find out if they have the proper screen, they are willing listeners to all the new propositions and these propositions are numerous, as it is impossible to give an accurate list of all the preparations offered to-day. Some of the metallic compositions placed on the market will, in certain cases, give even a brighter light than the mirror screen, but they do not show the details as well. It is a question for the exhibitor to decide if he wants to sacrifice the details for the light or if he prefers a less blinding curtain and obtain the best details of the picture. The mirror screen is a lasting proposition and will show the details in six months, one year or more, as clearly as the first day. On the other hand, the mirror screen is an expensive proposition and for this reason, many of the metallic compositions will answer the purpose of the exhibitors who cannot afford to pay some $300 or $400 for a mirror screen.

The merit of the metallic compositions is the low cost at first. We say at first, as in the course of time we believe that an exhibitor will spend as much as he would for a mirror screen. The metallic compositions or paints will gather the dirt, will change color and, unless the curtains are repainted several times during the year, they will look worse and give worse results than the old sheet screen.

It is not our object to discuss the merits of the different screens and curtain preparations at this time, but we wanted to say a few words on the screen to show that if the curtain plays a very important part on the projection of good pictures, the colors of the decorations of the auditorium play an equally important part.

Many of the moving picture theaters are erected and decorated by local talent, who may know how to build dwelling houses and factories, but who have no knowledge of exhibition hall requirements. We know that architects are not the proper men to design a play house, unless they have made a careful study of acoustics. In the construction of a moving picture theater the acoustics is of little importance, while the attention should be given to the light effects, and this is where most of the architects, builders, decorators and exhibitors are making a grave mistake, in having the interior walls and ornaments of light colors. Such colors will suit an opera house but not a moving picture theater. We have always advocated that sombre colors will bring out better effects from the screen and we have based our opinion not on hearsay or theory but on observation.

As men differ so much on questions of colors and tastes, we concluded that the best way to prove our argument, was to give a practical demonstration. To this effect we had constructed two miniature theaters and said theaters are now on exhibition in the rooms of our Chicago offices, 160 Washington street, where exhibitors passing through Chicago can judge for themselves what effect the colors of the interior walls and decorations can have on the screen.

These two miniture theaters are a conclusive demonstration and a peep at them will soon convince any exhibitor of the necessity of selecting certain colors for his interior decorations and not to leave such an important matter to the local decorator, who has no real knowledge of the needs of motion picture theaters.

As many exhibitors ready to make alterations will not have the time or opportunity to visit our Chicago offices, we give a description of the two miniature theaters: One of these, the one on the left side of the photograph, is finished in the following manner: All the mouldings and plastic ornaments are painted imitation dark hardwood. The center of the panels is of a rich green with the borders in a darker green shade. The ceiling is also finished in green color. The screen fits in a recess, the sides of which are painted a dead black.

The second theater, the one on the right side, has the same ornaments and mouldings, but both the walls and ornaments are finished, like most of our moving picture theaters, in cream color of two different shades. Ceiling and frame of the screen match.

Examine carefully the photograph and, as it is claimed that photography does not lie, be convinced that dark surroundings bring forth the full value of the screen. As the photograph shows plainly that the screen in the theater to the left (the one finished in dark colors) is whiter and offers more contrast with its surroundings than the screen of the light colored theater, we must come to the conclusion that the colors of the interior walls and decorations of a moving picture theater affect more or less the projection of a good picture.

The photograph was taken in daytime, without any projection, but when the light is turned on and a picture projected on the screens of these two miniature theaters, the contrast between the two screens is still greater.

In a light colored theater the light of the machine naturally reflects on the cream colored walls and then on the curtain; and many exhibitors, not acquainted with his fact, blame the operator for a bad light.

While the miniature theater on the left of the photograph is rather sombre in color, it is not gloomy but rich in effects, and when the side lights are turned on the house has a rich soft glow.

We do not exactly recommend the green color, other combinations can be used with the same good results. For instance: Have the panels in a rich red color with the border of still a darker shade and have all the plastic ornaments painted imitation walnut or mahogany and you will have one of the richest interiors that you can wish. When you use green color for your panels and borders you can have the plastic ornaments in either walnut or ebony color. Brown colored walls and the plastic ornaments, imitation old ivory or old oxidized silver would also produce a rich and tasteful interior.

The whole question is to decorate the interior of your house in rather sombre colors and avoid the prevailing idea that a light colored interior is more cheerful to the eye. Remember that when your patrons visit your theater they do not do so to examine your walls but to look at the pictures and they want good and well projected pictures.

As stated above, the two miniature theaters are on exhibition in the display rooms of our Western offices, 160 Washington street, Chicago, Ill., and the attendants will always be pleased to throw a light or a picture on the two screens to give you a practical demonstration. In addition to these two miniature theaters, we are preparing a few panels to show different color combinations.

The sign with interchangeable letters and pictures of the film to be shown is still on exhibition and is attracting many visitors. In a couple of weeks the Chicago office will also have on exhibition a practical demonstration of the side lights.

THE "USUAL THING" IN ENGLAND.

[From The Kinematograph.]

I have, whilst chatting with Mr. Jupp, of the Provincial Cinematograph Theaters, Ltd., and other leading showmen, had it impressed on me that they have tremendous difficulty in finding worthy and suitable subjects each week for their programs. The mediocrity and sameness of the stories, the poorness of the romantic melodrama, the inane knockabout comic, the ridiculous chase, and the all too apparent trick film, may be suitable for any country fair or East End penny gaff, but are quite unsuitable for a West End audience in an up-to-date picture palace, and the consequence is they are faced with a difficulty which seems hard to solve. I have suggested a revival of some of our most popular "back numbers" until such time as manufacturers can go to a wider field for their plots and ideas—and pay liberally for them when discovered.

When Artemus Ward, the American humorist, toured the country with his panorama, more than fifty years ago, he hired local musicians occasionally to furnish music for his pictures. He told of one genius who played "Take Your Foot Out o' the Sand" for the illustration of the children of Israel crossing the Red Sea, and "A Life on the Ocean Wave" for Pharaoh's pursuing army engulfed by the waters. So the problem of appropriate picture music is not altogther a new one; the difference between then and now is in degree rather more than in substance. It is not many years since stereopticon views occupied the position in vaudeville houses now held by moving pictures, and even then some of us tried to fit these pictures with music, though our efforts were limited. Waltzes and marches, interspersed with "Flower Song," "Rock of Ages," "Skeleton Dance," with patriotic songs, was about as far as anybody got.

It is a long step from the old stereopticon views to the splendid moving pictures by our best producers of to-day. Has the music kept pace with it? In some instances—almost. But generally speaking—no. The fact is, the change has been so rapid that we haven't fully realized our opportunities, but the moving picture musician will soon adavnce to a plane as distinctive in type as any phase of musical endeavor.

Our problems are more complex than they seem to be. We have no rehearsals; we know nothing of the pictures until we see them at the first show, during which we must "play something" and at the same time determine on the most fitting music. This entails good guessing and a good memory, and our compensation lies in the fascination of the game and a consciousness of work well done. To those who are good improvisers the task is less difficult, but, if one depends entirely upon impromptu stuff, he is apt to fall into a rut, and that spells "monotony."

We have roughly classified our pictures as scenic, industrial and dramatic. The last has many sub-divisions: tragedy, farce, melodrama, drama, light comedy, burlesque, fairy tales, mythological, biblical and historical plays are the ones most commonly met with and each has its own type of music.

Tragedy (Shakespearean order).—Music is stately, massive and always serious. Marches in "four-four" time; heavy "hurrys" for combats and battles; gavottes and polonaise for "fill-in.' Dances in court dress are usually the gavotte or minuet. No waltzes, two-steps or anything suggestive of modern music. For pathetic scenes use standard numbers or ballads of the period.

Farce.—Lively, snappy stuff; rag and other marches; popular song choruses whenever they can be applied. All comedies should be worked bright and lively from start to finish except where special points are to be made. For example, the funeral march in "A Live Corpse" heightened the absurdity of the situation, and a dirge or other lugubrious tune makes a comedy duel all the funnier. But, generally speaking, comedies (especially farces) move swiftly, and the music likewise.

Melodrama.—More or less of a sensational order. Get in all the local suggestion possible; "Cheyenne," "Idaho," etc., for the cowboy pictures; "Old Kentucky Home" and Southern songs for the South, and so on. Most localities have a song written around them—if your audience knows it—play it. This class of pictures is the most common of all and calls for plenty of dramatic music. "Hurrys," "plaintives," "agitates," and "sneaky" music abound. The contrasts are usually well defined and the changes of music are often abrupt. If you have the gift of progressing from one number to another with a few connecting chords, it helps. The "fill-ins" depend on the character of the picture. Two-steps, rags, waltzes, intermezzos and popular music generally. These pictures are the easiest to work up and the most showy for the musician.

Drama.—Quieter and more refined, but on lines similar to melodrama. Often calls for long and dainty numbers like "Laces and Graces," "Cozy Corner," etc. Sentimental and pathetic like "Apple Blossoms," "Simple Aveu" (though these numbers are good in all pictures). For "fill-ins" use waltzes, marches, gavottes, intermezzos, etc.

Light Comedy. What is said of farce will apply here also. "Mosquitos Parade," "Lobsters' Promenade" and numbers of humorous quality are useful.

Burlesque.—These are mostly European productions, and the range of the subject is very wide. They are very often of the "Humpty-Dumpty" pantomime order with gymnasts, clowns and quick transformations; the music is generally lively. For demons, magic, etc., J. Bodewalt Lampe's "Vision of Salome" is fine. Th. Bendix also has some fine numbers in this line. "Hurrys," "mysteriosos," are frequently called for.

Fairy Tales.—Waltzes, intermezzos and pretty, graceful numbers generally. Like the burlesque, these pictures vary so much that nothing definite can be suggested. Both kinds of pictures embody all of the elements in any of the others.

Mythological.—I have seen but few of these pictures, and they were of the Greek mythology. The music required was stately, interspersed with mysterious, wierd and agitated music. They are serious pictures.

Biblical.—Of a dignified character throughout. Standard church music and sacred songs. Grandioso movements and ponderous marches in four-four time when marches are required. Nothing suggestive of modern times. An organ, even a small reed organ, can be used with telling effect.

Historical—are martial, romantic and religious. They vary so much that little can be suggested further than to fit the time and nation when possible. Avoid modern music, especially waltzes and two-steps. Often they "work up" like melodrama.

The hints given here are of a general character only, as there can be no fixed rules applying to all alike. However, they cover the ground as far as they go. I have said nothing of the scientific and educational pictures, as they require no special treatment. Any concert music, as selections, waltzes overtures, etc., will be suitable.

PITTSBURG.

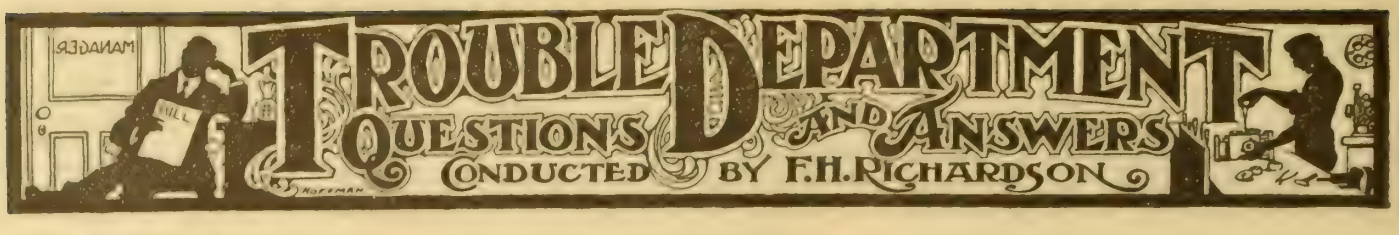
It was my pleasure, while passing through Pittsburg, to meet Mr. A. S. Davis, of the Independent Film Exchange, who knowing my constant work for good music for the pictures, invited me to visit the Olympic Theater on Fifth avenue. There I found an orchestra of five expert musicians, who so well interpreted a Thanhouser production that while captivated, I did not notice on the screen a slight blunder in the picture, a blunder that jumped to my eye the very next day, when I saw the same picture in another theater and butchered by a ragtime pianist. The blunder was that the man who had dived in the water to rescue his sweetheart, appeared on the screen with his hair perfectly dry, well combed and parted as if he had just left the barber chair.

It is a fact, if you have a bad seat, a Merry Widow hat in front of you, a rough usher, a bad light, or ragtime music, you feel in bad humor and then you exert yourself to find fault with something, while good music seems to soothe your nerves.

The manager of the Olympic takes great pains to show the pictures to the best advantage, and the good attendance, with standing room at a premium, fully proves that Pittsburg lovers of motion pictures, recognize the efforts of the owner and manager.

The Olympic is a good sized house with a very spacious lobby of most exquisite design, simple but rich, and all the cheap gingerbread decorations, so common in other theaters, are advantageously replaced by marble and more substantial plaster ornaments. The house is one of the safest ones in the country, having numerous exits leading to a wide corridor running from Fifth avenue to the rear street.

I was much amused, and at the same time pleased, when an usher asked a lady to remove her Merry Widow hat. As the usher made his request in very polite terms, the lady did not get offended but complied with the request. J. M. B.



From Oklahoma.—Hugo, Okla., writes at some length on the light ray proposition, but we have laid that matter on the shelf until receipt of the promised article from the Bausch & Lomb Company, which we hope will clear up the atmosphere. Hugo says: "I am glad to see the operators are getting interested in such questions, since it means better projection. If some of the crank turners of to-day could have been on the road seven or eight years ago, what in the world would they have done? I went West about twelve years ago with a Spool Bank machine and have watched the business grow, learning something new every day. Have tackled current all the way from 50 volts to 750; have projected a picture from 20 feet to 175 feet, and have, in emergency, used a stereo lens for projecting moving pictures. Some day I shall write you some of my experiences on low and high voltages and how I got around different kinds of propositions.

"Now just a word about our theater here in Hugo. It contains 358 opera chairs. We have 115-volt, 60-cycle current and my leads are No. 4 stranded. We get the best pictures that can be had with an Edison Type 'B,' using 12 reels per week Independent service, nothing over 30 days, which is pretty good for a town of 5,500."

Glad to have you relate the experiences of other days, Hugo. Operators used in the beginning, when appliances were crude, to perform some stunts that would make the wiseacres of to-day sit up and take considerable notice, and the relation of some of them cannot fail to be interesting. The man who is proud of the fact that he is "learning something every day" is one who is likely to succeed in almost anything he undertakes. The self-satisfied man who imagines he knows it all will almost invariably be found to really not know much of anything. Your theater seems to be a pretty classy little house for a small town. Did you ever, in emergency, use a condensing lens for a stereo. objective? It can be done.

Gaslight.—Washington, D. C., propounds the following: "Dear Mr. Richardson—I appeal to you as an authority, to ask the following: Is there any reason why two gas-making apparatuses (with two jets and two limes installed by cutting a hole in the lamp house) could not be used to project a film? Would the heat be too great for the condensing lenses? Which is the best gas-making machine, the Model 'B' (Enterprise Optical Company) or the Edison? Does metallic paint on the screen really show up the picture better than plain muslin? Does the brightness of gas depend upon the quantity of candle or the quantity of gas generated?"

No, Washington, two gaslights could not possibly be used in one machine, for the reason that each light spot has to be a certain given distance from the condensing lenses and opposite its exact center. This, of course, would not be possible with two separate lights. With the Edison gas-making outfit, I am not personally acquainted, but I have used the Model "B" and know it to be an excellent contrivance for the generation of gas. As to metallic paint, it has to be applied exactly right; that is to say, in exactly the right manner, or the results will not be good. An aluminum coated screen is certainly brighter than white muslin. The brightness of the gaslight depends, within certain limits, upon the size of the jet used and the diameter of the lime stick, which latter may be 1 inch or 1¼ inch. With the large tip the 1¼-inch lime stick is usually used. By "candle" you undoubtedly mean the stick of lime upon which the gas jet plays, the incandescence of which produces the illumination.

Transformer Primary.—Chicago, Ill., writes as follows: "Friend Richardson—There has been a discussion upon a certain point relating to the transformer. I am not going to tell you which is my side and which is the other fellow's side of the controversy, but merely ask you a question that will settle the matter, namely: What would happen if I connected my inductor to direct current lines?"

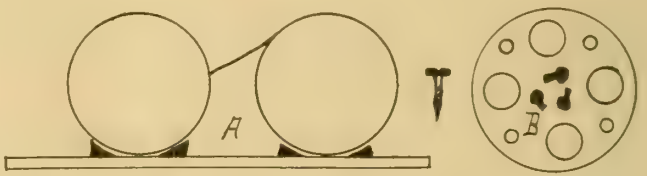
My dear boy, there would not very much of anything happen except that you would get a flow of current on the secondary, which would last about 1-100th of a second and then your fuses would blow.

A Very Useful Idea.—Ashland, Ore. (A. Lundberg, proprietor Star Theater), writes as follows: "The last time I wrote you I placed my own slats in some danger, though I had no intention of slurring any of the operators here in Ashland, but merely to set forth the other side of a certain question. This time I wish to mention a few little things which I have made use of. Possibly others have tried similar schemes, but they have never, to my knowledge, been mentioned in print; it may be that they are not generally known.

"First, to protect the operator from the heat of the lamp house I hang up a common narrow window shade on spring rollers between the operator and the lamp house. It is not at all in the way, and I can adjust the carbons just as easy as though it were not there. The shade can easily be fire proofed. A pull and it is out of the way, since it acts just like what it really is, a spring roller window shade.

"Second, I use a hand-power rewinder, and though it was easy enough to rewind while running the machine, it is difficult to pull out the reel shafts to remove the reels without their dropping to the floor. I, therefore, put a long narrow shelf a quarter of an inch below the edge of release, with raised stops, so that when the reel drops it only falls one-quarter of an inch and cannot roll over because of the stops. (See 'A' in sketch.)

"Third, I found that it requires the most time in threading the machine to put the end of the film under the spring on the takeup reel. It is awkward to get at and with some makes of machines it is very awkward. This is how I remedied the trouble, and it works like a charm: I took off one side of the reel and instead of the taper head wood screws, we put in their place flat head screws, as per 'C' in sketch. I then enlarged the holes in the reel plate and filed slots out from them as shown. (See 'B' in sketch.) The screw holes must be made large enough so that the screw head will slip through. After the film end is fastened under the clip, slip the screw heads through the holes and give the plate a little twist so that the stem of the screw enters into the slot and —there you are. This little device saves a lot of time and aggravation."



Neighbor Lundberg, we certainly thank you on behalf of the readers of the Trouble Department for the first and third suggestions made by you, particularly the third. The sketch shows plainly just what is meant and any operator can easily fix reels for his takeup without much, if any, trouble. As regards the second, or rewinder proposition, I do not like that at all for the very simple reason that I do not believe in any operator rewinding film, or doing anything else while his machine is running, except watch the curtain. That man never stood on two legs who could do two or three things at one time and do them all in the best possible manner. When the machine is running the operator has got all he can attend to if he maintains A No. 1, first class projection, and he has absolutely no business rewinding film. That is a little jacking up for you, Neighbor Lundberg, but I am sure it will be accepted good naturedly. For your other suggestions, you deserve the thanks of every reader of the column.

Semi-Automatic Tension Regulator.—Santa Barbara, Cal. (Wm. Paige, Victor Photoplay Theater): "I have noticed operators are trying for an automatic takeup tension regulator. I will explain how I solved that particular proposition insofar as the Edison Model 'B' is concerned. Have fastened the weight on the arm of belt pulley to a wire and run the wire up to an old piece of knife switch secured to the machine. By raising or lowering the handle of the switch I tighten or loosen the tension on the belt. I put on a heavier belt; that is to say, a stiffer one, and run it very, very loose, just so that at the start the takeup reel barely pulls the film into the magazine. There is absolutely no pull on the film at all, and as the reel fills I, if necessary, lower my lever a trifle Strange to say, however, I seldom have to increase my tension even when the takeup reel is full It therefore, answers the purpose of an automatic, with the advantage that if I should lose my lower loop I do not have to stop the machine to make a new one, but can at once take off all tension on the film and make a new loop while my machine is still running I, therefore, never have any stops on account of losing my lower loop, and that helps to improve the show, I think. I trust this may be of some use to other operators I have also a Pathe head and am going to dope up something for that if I can. We are running four reels of licensed film and always have a pleasing bill. I find the Moving Picture World the one best bet in all moving picture publications. In fact, so thoroughly does it fill the bill that we do not subscribe for any other. I always read the Trouble Department first when the paper comes, even though other matters may be demanding my attention."

Neighbor Paige, you will kindly accept a good large wad of our thanks on behalf of the readers of the column I can see with half an eye that your scheme would work all right with the Model "B," and it would not be any trick at all to rig up a similar device for any other machine. This makes about six different automatic and semi-automatic devices that have been brought to light through the first item in the Trouble Department, and all of these schemes have been thoroughly practical I think this is a very nice illustration of the value of the Department, if any demonstration of its value is needed Come again, Neighbor Paige, there is always space in the column for such articles as yours.

Small Projection Light Plant.—From our good friend, B. W Merrill, Edgar, Neb., comes the following: "A word as to experience with my own D. C. plant, purchased from the Fairbanks-Morse Company. It is a 9 h. p. special electric engine and a 5 k. w. generator of the same make. As to the regulation, it is better than that of most steam engines It is guaranteed to regulate within 2 per cent., but on actual test is even closer than that. I have used it about a year and have had no trouble at all. With gasoline at 10 cents per gallon, it produces current at 3½ cents per k..w. I do not have city current in my house at all, since with proper care I have no fear of this machine failing me. The dynamo is 110 volts. With a 60-volt dynamo the plant would not have to be so large, since the number of watts consumed would be less on 60 than on 110. Nevertheless, I advise the use of a 110-volt generator, since it would be easy to connect with the city current, should you wish to use it. I have installed an outside shutter on my Edison machine in such manner that it does not change position when the framing device is used. It has greatly improved the picture. With the shutter outside you can remove the lower film guard and make a larger lower loop, if you wish."

You have our thanks, Neighbor Merrill. Some notes of experience as regards these small light plants are exactly what we are looking for. You say, however, that the engine is a 9 h. p. "special electric engine." I think you must mean special gasoline engine. You are mistaken in one thing. It would be just as easy to connect to the city 110-volt plant if you were using 60-volt dynamo as it would be if you were using 110-volt machine. You would merely have to have things arranged so that when you cut over to the city plant you would cut in some additional resistance. That would be all. The saving through the use of a 60-volt dynamo would be quite considerable.

Kind Words.—Glenwood Springs, Col., sends in a drawing for the double connection and writes as follows: "I am a pioneer reader of the World and have learned many things from the column, which I am very glad to see increasing in size."

The wiring diagram was very nicely drawn up. The 2-pole, double-throw switch was used, and a single pole knife switch was added to cut in the extra rheostat. Glad you like the column, Glenwood Springs, and shall be glad to hear from you at any time you have something interesting to communicate.

Alabastine and Aluminum.—From Homer, Ill. (C. B. Burkhardt, manager Homer Park), comes the following: "I notice in the Department where some poor manager, operator or proprietor is up against the curtain question. This is how I improved my curtain a whole lot. I used bleached muslin, sewed to give the required width. I then procured a 3 pound package of alabastine and 1 pound of dry aluminum. In mixing the two together care must be taken, using very little water at first, until the two are thoroughly incorporated, then thin to the required consistency. The muslin should be stretched on a frame or wall where it is to remain, so that when it shrinks it will be perfectly tight and smooth. Have tried this same combination on an old curtain and made a screen of it. It seems as if the texture of the cloth showing through helps out the curtain. I also tried a curtain with aluminum paint and found it a decided failure, since the high gloss caused a mist or, seemingly, veil, to appear in front of the picture The alabastine and aluminum composition has a tendency to make the picture stand out and make the light show up better I trust this may help some poor fellow out of trouble."

Many thanks, Neighbor Burkhardt. I have noticed that whenever I get a letter from you it contains an idea Therefore, I am always glad to see the picture of your park on the envelope Personally, I am inclined to think that English whiting would work even better than alabastine, though possibly not. That particular combination (aluminum and alabastine) would not have struck me favorably I am perfectly willing, however, to accept your statement that it is O. K. and on the strength of it recommend it to our readers for trial.

A Ghost. Ellwood City, Pa., writes as follows "Friend Richardson—I am running an Edison machine and have constant trouble with red and blue lights appearing across the bottom of the screen. I can fix this by adjusting my carbons, but in the center of the screen there appears a blue spot, which I am unable to eliminate."

Try moving your lamp house back as far as it will go or, if it is clear back, try moving it ahead. If this does not remove the ghost (blue spot) the trouble lies in your condenser, and I shall have to know the width of your picture and the distance from the machine to screen in order to advise your further.

Keep Your Machine Clean.—From Atlanta, Ga., comes a lengthy letter, in fact, too lengthy to receive space in its entirety. Atlanta calls attention to the necessity of keeping the machine scrupulously clean; also particularly to the importance of thoroughly cleaning the lenses, both projection and condensing. So careful of his machine is Atlanta that when it is not running he covers it with a closely woven cloth hood. He also calls attention to the absolute necessity of placing the operating room in charge of a high class man instead of a $12 a week boy, all of which is eminently correct. Atlanta finishes with the following: "As to Neighbor Crowe's idea of the crossing of the light rays, will say that a beam of light coming from the condenser may be made to cross either in the projection lens or outside of it, dependent upon the adjustment of the arc with relation to the condenser. The light coming from the condensing system would not form an image by itself. A projection lens must be used to form the image and it is this lens that actually reverses the image. If Neighbor Crowe will experiment with the adjustment of his arc with relation to his condensers, he will note that the beam of light can be made to cross at various points. It should, however, cross in the center of the projection lens to get the best results."

There is no doubt but what the operator should keep his machine, lenses and everything else in connection with the operating room clean. There is no doubt but what better results will be had and that the life of the apparatus will be prolonged by so doing. Glad to hear from you at any time, Atlanta, but try to condense matters as much as possible, since space is very valuable.

Bad Film Stock.—A certain machine manufacturer submitted a piece of film, a pair of tension springs and an aperture plate to the Editor of this Department for an opinion as to what caused damage to a film, as an exhibitor claimed large remuneration on the ground that it was the fault of the machine. The lighting of a match proved the stock to be N. I., which fact I suspected as soon as I saw it. Right through one row of sprocket holes ran a clean even split, sometimes at one edge of the sprocket hole, sometimes in the center and sometimes at the other edge. It took about ten seconds to decide that the fault was not in the machine, but in the film stock itself. It was not even necessary to examine the springs and aperture plate to form this opinion, although, of course, I looked at them. This splitting down the sprocket holes was one of the first faults developed after the introduction of N. I. film stock. The fact that the split was sometimes on one side of the sprocket holes and sometimes on the other side proved that it had not been done by the machine. I publish this for the purpose of warning exhibitors that where a film exchange claims damages on account of the non-inflammable film splitting down through the sprocket holes, it will be well to delay payment for same until some competent authority has decided that your machine did the damage instead of the fault being in the stock itself.

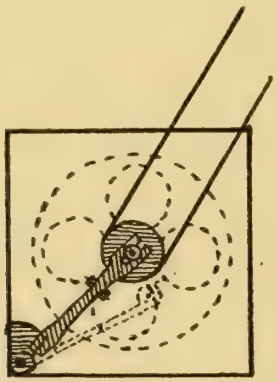
Another Takeup Tension Equalizer.—Brooklyn, N. Y. (Robt. C. Hart, manager), writes as follows: "In reading the World, which I read every week, advertisements and all, I noticed the diagram on page 1,049, November 5 issue, illustrating a tension equalizer device. I have given considerable attention to this matter and noticed that the said device does not appear to make any provision for the magazine. I also note that tension is applied to the driving belt, which appears to me would have a tendency to separate the belt at its coupling, the arm evidently being rigid. I have no machine at present upon which to make tentative trials, but am taking the liberty of enclosing a sketch of the device which I have evolved, which I have had in mind for some time, and of which I propose to make a working model. The interior arm, or lever (which can be curved to conform to the circular magazine), is connected with a shaft passing through the bearing and the wall of the magazine. Upon the exterior end of the shaft is a wedge cam engaging a lever working in a manner which, in turn, operates the tension. When the takeup reel is full the exterior lever rides upon a flat table at the thick edge of the cam, leaving the inner arm up and out of the way while removing the full reel and adjusting the empty one, when it can be again placed in position for the next run, which will restore the tension to its original position. I trust my drawing and explanation are sufficiently lucid for comprehension."



Well, I don't know about that, Neighbor Hart. I may be thick headed, but I fail to understand just exactly how your device works, and I should be very glad to have you submit more complete sketches. So far as I can see, the reel would not remain central in the magazine. If this is true, I believe it would be a serious objection, since magazines are not made very much larger than the diameter of the reels, and the reels are sometimes considerably more than full of film. Won't you please sketch this thing out in such manner that I will be enabled to thoroughly understand it?

Another Fine Drawing.—Stromsburg, Neb., sends in a most excellent drawing of the triple pole, double throw switch connection and says that he has worked hard on it ever since he read the letter in the column and that, as Brother Crowe says, "It is mighty hard on one's hair." The connections shown by Stromsburg are correct and in some ways it was really the best drawing submitted, in that he used one color of ink to show the live wires when alternating was used and another color to show the live wires when direct was used. One thing that I do not like, Stromsburg, is the fact that you drew the carbons on "jack-knife" set, which would indicate that you are using it yourself. You can take it from me, that is wrong. Yet get a higher candle power that way, but you cannot control your light. I am sorry your drawing came too late for publication, and though you may have added a gray hair or two, I think you will admit that you are benefited by the study involved.

Steel Carbon Arms.—Chicago, Ill., writes as follows: "I have a ——— lamp and am using heavy amperage D. C. As a general proposition I break a carbon clamp or arm about once a week. Could you suggest a remedy? I am sure the Trouble Department has done a great deal to improve projection here in Chicago, and I have very frequently found operators poring over its pages, studying the various problems presented."

The arms of the lamp you are using are not very strong, Chicago, and the metal from which they are made loses a large percentage of its strength under the action of heat. I would suggest that you have a blacksmith make steel arms and clamps for your lamp, using a pair of the old ones as models. Such a set of arms and clamps probably would cost you no more than $2 or $2.50 and they will last for years. Have them made out of steel, not iron. The resistance of the steel won't amount to anything, since its cross section will be large and the current will only pass through two or three inches of it. I am glad to know that the Chicago boys find value in the Department. I happen to know that a good many who are opposed to the dissemination of knowledge (and there are a few of them right there in Chicago, too) are not above taking a quiet little peek at the Trouble Department themselves.

Another Three-Pole Switch Sketch.—Cortland Christiani, Washington, D. C., has also submitted a correct sketch of the three-pole switch connection.

Picture Jumps.—Springfield, Vt., writes as follows: "Am having some trouble with my Power's No. 5. The machine is only six months old and I cannot get a steady picture. Have put in new intermittent sprocket bushings, but the picture jumps just as much as it did before. I am a constant reader of the Moving Picture World and could not keep house without it."

It is possible, Springfield, that the trouble lies in the film. Try a new Pathe film, and if it jumps, that settles it, the fault is in the machine since Pathe perforations are practically perfect. One prolific cause for film jumping is dirt on the face of the intermittent sprocket. Purchase an ordinary tooth brush and with it keep the face of all sprockets, particularly the intermittent, clean. It is also possible, though not probable, that your tension springs are too weak. If so, bow them out with your screwdriver. It is also possible that your intermittent sprocket shaft or the intermittent sprocket itself is not true, in which case, however, the jump would be regular, four times every time the crank goes round. It is also possible that the jumping is not in the machine at all, but is due to vibration in the operating room floor. It is also barely possible that your projection lens tube fits loosely and teters in the jacket. I think you will find the trouble in one of these things. If not, please communicate with me further.

From the Sunny South.—E. G. Henson, manager The Rex Theater, Charleston, W. Va., writes as follows: "The Moving Picture World, with its many goods things, still continues to be the attraction among my employees every Tuesday night at our theater. I only have one copy, and the boys gather around until it reminds me of a barber shop with its proverbial 'next.' All my papers are kept on file and the 52 copies that come each year make a very large volume indeed, but to that treasury of information I can go with confidence if anything happens in my operating room. When anything happens the extra head is placed in service and the show starts again. I then look over my file of papers, in the Department conducted by yourself, and find nearly every time the answer to my trouble. I think, taking the column from its birth, every question that could possibly be propounded concerning a moving picture machine has been asked. The suggestions made through the column by other operators are of great value, and I believe every one who has the good of the moving picture business at heart and desires to learn more should thank those who suggest these different things. I, for one, like to read where some operator has had a real trouble and, better still, to read where you answer it in your own way, making it so very plain that anyone who is fit to be in an operating room can, from your answer, at once do what has to be done, and do it quick. At last the Imp people have found that we of the South are still on the map and have framed up that splendid picture, 'Dixie.' I put it on for five nights to capacity and now our people have a warm spot for the Imp people. We are about ready to move into our new house, built at a cost of $27,000, the building being 180 feet long by 50 feet wide, seating 900; stage, 50 by 32, 40 feet to gridiron. We have pictures and vaudeville five nights each week, the other nights being devoted to first class road productions. We feature our pictures, not our vaudeville, and if the vaudeville received the applause our pictures do, they would all want to play the Big Town as headliners."

Your words of appreciation are, of course, very pleasing to us, Friend Henson. The Editors of the World are trying to deserve the commendation of their patrons and, judging by the compliments received, we are succeeding. The keeping of the papers on file will, in the course of time, build you up a library of moving picture information, which will be of great value. I believe you would also find the handbook we have just gotten out of great value to you, since in it the information is crystallized, condensed and indexed. You surely ought to be proud of the new house, and we trust you will have all kinds of success in it. You ought to suggest to the other boys that the World only costs $2.00 per year. If they are going to stay in the business, and rise to the rank of managers, each one should have a file of his own and not depend on yours.

Sprocket Holes Again.—Shelbyville, Ill., asks how to keep the sprocket holes from showing on the screen.

Shelbyville will find this trouble was dealt with and answered on page 1,170, October 19 issue.

Legal Foolishness.—Pennsylvania writes setting forth the fact that he arrived in New York November 13 with a road show, installed his machine and chased all over Brooklyn and finally to the Park Row Building, New York, in search of a permit or license to enable him to fill his New York engagement, only to be informed that he could register and be examined in the sweet bye and bye,- probably in two or three weeks from date of registration. There was nothing left to do but pack up and move on to Philadelphia.

As I have pointed out before, some provision should be made by the department to immediately examine operators in cases of this kind. By reference to page 88, July 9 issue, Philadelphia will see that I have already set forth my views on this subject. I really believe a traveling operator could sue the city and collect damages in case he was refused the right to put on his show, the same as all other traveling showmen do. The city has a right to license, but also a man has a right to work, and a traveling man cannot reasonably be expected to wait three weeks or even five hours for examination. Later: I have been assured that arrangements will be made in the near future to give immediate examination to road show men.

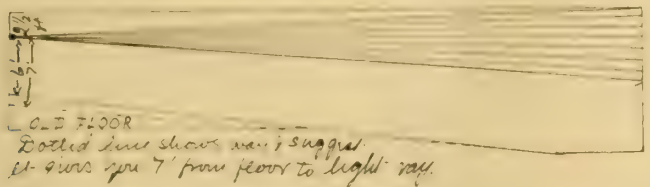
Change in Theater.—Neola, Ia., asks advice as regards changing the floor of his theater. The present room is 30 feet long, with 12-foot ceiling. He wishes to extend the building length to 61 feet and slope the floor beginning 3½ feet above the old floor at the back end, making a total drop of 6½ feet in 61.



By referring to sketch, it will be seen that raising the back end of the floor 3½ feet and locating the machine lens 2½ feet from the ceiling will leave about 6 feet from the floor to the lower edge of the light ray, with a 10-foot picture. (A 10-foot picture is 7 feet 4 inches high.) I would suggest starting the floor 2½ feet above the old floor at the back end and drop it down 5 feet to a point 8 feet from the front wall, or curtain, thence level. This will give good view of the picture and be plenty steep enough. There willl then be no necessity for raising the ceiling, as Neola seems to think he will have to do.

Lamp Trouble.—New York City, N. Y., writes that he has a Power's lamp with which he is having trouble. Says no matter how tight he sets up the screws the arms loosen up and knock the carbons out of place; says also that the arms slip off sideways and the feeding screw, or handle, binds. Asks where he can get powdered graphite, says Montgomery & Co. do not sell it.

I would suggest the lamp be taken to the Power's office, 115 Nassau street. There are many imitations of Power's and other standard lamps put out, some of which are practically worthless. This may be one of them. If it is a Power's lamp and anything was wrong, probably that company will make it right. You can get the powdered graphite in one-pound cans of Montgomery & Co.

Another Idea.—Audubon, Ia., writes as follows: "A very handy tool for making patches is a small box (cigar box will do), with glass top and a small incandescent lamp inside. By using this contrivance you are able to see just how to scrape your film in patching."

We are indebted to you, Audubon, for the idea? The better way, however, is to set a small strip of plate glass in the top of work bench, or bench on which rewinding is done, placing an electric globe underneath. Audubon also condemns the making of wide patches, patches out of frame, etc., evils with which we are all conversant and which we all heartily wish could be eliminated.

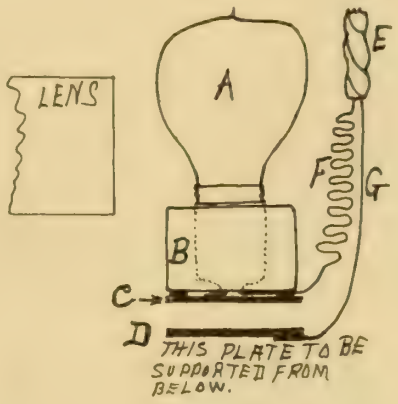
Bad Patches, Etc. Los Angeles, Cal. (Wm. H. Hepburn), writes: "The condition of 10 to 24-day stuff out in this country is about the limit, whether through the ignorance, carelessness, or plain don't give a d——edness, I don't know; hence these lines through the column as to the proper way of making patches. Have been with this house about two years, one year as operator and the rest as manager. During that time rank patches have been my main trouble. I will not start a picture out of frame, nor allow it to go out of frame during the run if in any way it can be avoided, and nine cases out of ten it can. Breaks in this house are very unusual, and the patrons do not hesitate to praise the entertainment. There is nothing more disgusting than to have the picture jump out of the frame just at some interesting point, or to have it jump out and stay until the operator happens to look up and notice it. I have my operator look through the lens and frame the picture before he starts, and rarely is the framing lever touched all through the run. When I receive a compliment on the show, I do not swell my chest out and say, 'Behold the great I Am.' As manager I take the credit of selection of program, but the boy upstairs is told of his share and he works for a continuance of the compliments, hence he works for the house, for me and for himself and we all pull together. We wish the column and its able Editor every success."

Neighbor Hepburn sends samples of bad patches and some of them are sure beauties. He also sends a sample made by himself, which is most excellent, though, perhaps, a trifle narrow, being not quite ⅛ inch. A patch that narrow would have to be very well made, indeed, to have sufficient strength. Given the necessary strength, however, the narrower the better.



I would suggest that instead of having the operator look through the lens, Friend Hepburn use a contrivance such as is shown in sketch, "A" being a small incandescent lamp, "B" a block of wood, upon the bottom of which is fastened copper plate, "C." "E" is a flexible light cord containing two wires, "F" and "G." "D" is a second copper plate fastened to something stationary immediately under the front of the projection lens. Solder the short wire of one binding post of the lamp to copper place "C;" attach "F" to the other lamp socket binding post; solder wire "G" to copper plate "D"; arrange so that lamp "A" and block "B" and copper plate "C" can be raised and lowered by a lever. When threading, drop the lamp down, having arranged copper plate "D" stationary so that copper plate "C" rests on plate "D" and lamp "A" will be immediately in front of the projection lens. The contact of plate "C" and "D" complete the circuit and automatically lights the lamp. The light shines through the film so that the operator can see to thread his machine in the frame, of course, moving the revolving shutter out of the way first. Separating plates "C" and "D" breaks the circuit and extinguishes the lamp, which should by a lever be raised high enough to be out of the way of the lens. If more managers would give the operator due credit, improvement in projection excellence would advance more rapidly.

Light Rays.—From North Tarrytown, N. Y., comes an excellent letter on light rays. I am sorry, Tarrytown, but we have laid this matter of light rays on the shelf waiting an article from the Bausch & Lomb Company experts which, by the way, is about due. Until that arrives we will not devote any further space to the light ray proposition. For your suggestion, let me say yours is not the only letter held up.

Condenser.—Kansas City, Mo., writes as follows: "Kindly inform me why a crack in the condenser will show on the screen through the stereo lens and not through the moving picture lens. When is your Handbook for Operators going to be ready? 'The bunch' is patiently waiting for it."

As regards the Handbook, Kansas City, it is now ready for delivery and orders will be filled immediately upon receipt. As to the other question: for the reason that the focal plane (object being illuminated and projected) is right up against the condenser in one case and a foot away in the other.

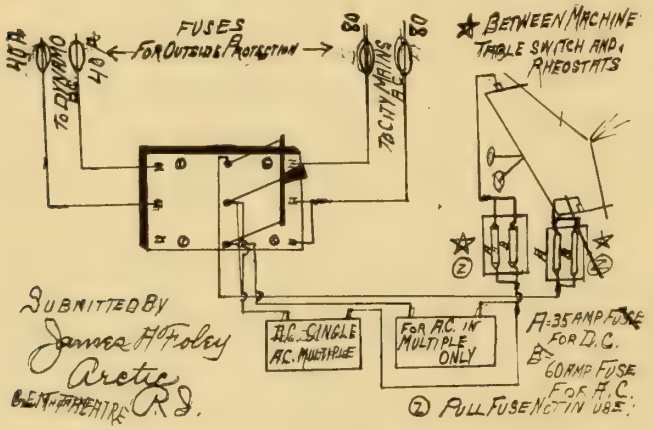
Those Wiring Diagrams.—Arctic, R. I., writes: "Have studied the wire diagrams (page 1,170, November 19 issue) very carefully and would like to make a few comments (not knocks) on same and expose my own ignorance. Sketch of Hugel shows rheostats in multiple, both A. C. and D. C. Also shows fuses live or charged at all times and doesn't state size of fuses to be used. (See "A Correction," last week's paper.) Turnpaugh has one rheostat alive at all times, even when not in use. (That is bad; Turnpaugh's rheostat should have been on other side.—Ed.) Cawthorne shows No. 2 on D. C., but shows no connection between poles "A" and "B" to bring No. 1 in multiple with No. 2. (Look again, Arctic; the multiple is made in another way.—Ed.) Slinger shows no multiple connection; he shows one house main wire direct to lamp from center of switch, the other wire direct to lamp from one outside pole of switch. How many short circuits are there in his diagram? (There aren't any, Arctic, so far as I can see. As a matter of fact, Slinger would have the rheostats in multiple on both A. C. and D. C.—Ed.) These comments are really questions for my own enlightenment. Recently a diagram appeared showing image of aperture out of the center with lens. Would removal of screws on one side of front plate and placing of small pieces of paper under same to raise it from machine frame, afterwards retightening the screws, act as means of centering image and lens? Believe me, there is something doing in the theater where I work if I don't get the first crack at the World when it arrives. I has been a great help to me, and you are to blame for it. Have a cut of my operating room; will send same with details if you care for it."



Glad to have the cut and details, Arctic. The raising of one side of the front plate might help. It is worth the experiment, anyhow. Your comments on wiring diagrams are not the only ones received. I certainly should have been disappointed if there were none. I published some diagrams that were not right on purpose, in place of others that were. Your own drawing is so excellent that I publish it herewith.

MOTOR ATTACHMENTS

for moving picture machines, Edison or any other make with a framing device. Guaranteed to run successfully with ordinary fan motor. Complete with gear and belt for motor, $15.00. I want agents everywhere; can give A-1 exclusive territory to right parties. This device is protected by U. S. Letters Patent; the public is warned against making, selling, buying or using infringing apparatus. Address, JAMES CHAMBLESS, 706 Third avenue, Evansville, Ind.

THE PRESS AND THE PICTURE.

Artistically, the moving picture men do not know where they are going, but they're on their way.

The picture drama is still in a raw, crude state.

The picture show has advanced not much further, thus far, than the blood-and-thunder melodrama which it has driven out of business.

The Eastern companies have been turning out, for the most part, the most excruciatingly rotten plays about the fair young country thing who fell in love with a wicked man from the city and came home to the old folk with a pale, haggard face and a little child in her arms.

The companies out here tried to equal that degree of punkness with dramas woven about Idaho Sue, the pride of the range, with some daring cowboys who get on and off the wrong side of their horses.

So far, the productions have been very much superior to the dramas. The stage management has, in some instances, been superb and the acting nearly as good. They have gone to great pains to stage insufficient and idiotic melodramas. Last Summer, for example, Mr. Bosworth took a company in wagons to the Yosemite Valley and swam the terrific rapids of the Merced River in order to give the proper color for an irritating playlet.

The picture companies have used the most wonderful and artistic pictures of the California missions as the background for stories so silly that they positively make your spine shrivel.

The picture producers have not yet had the courage or the wisdom to go to trained literary men for their plays, or if they have, the small amount of money offered by them in return for a masterpiece must have been insulting to a man of ideas. The local companies depend mainly on the fertile imagination of the stage managers—old stock actors. And you know the kind of a play an old stock actor would be likely to turn out; particularly if he had to invent one every week, as is the case.

They are beginning to see, however. One of the last catalogues of picture films issued to the trade advertises, among other things, "Justinian and Theodora," by Elbert Hubbard; a specially written play by Rex Beach; several by Opie Reed.

A most encouraging tendency of the picture play business is that of "picturizing" well-known plays and books.

A wonderful film of "Ramona" was made last Spring by the Biograph Company in California. The Selig Company also gave "Dora Thorne," and "Sam'l of Posen," with M. B. Curtiss himself in the star role.

In the East they have pictured many current plays, the most sensational success being the "Girl of the Golden West."

Another cheering feature is that well-known actors of established reputation are being employed—not to a great extent in this city, however.

It is hardly a secret among theater people that Joseph Kilgour was especially engaged at a whopping salary to take the part of George Washington in a recent big series of colonial pictures. He bears a remarkable resemblance to the illustrious George.

In France, a gorgeous production of the story of the Book of Esther has been put on two moving picture films. The following famous artists took the leading parts: Mlle. Gravier of the Theater de la Renaissance, as Esther; M. Leonce Perret of the Odeon, as Ahasuerus; M. Legrand of the Odeon, as Mordecai.

And in so many of the best of the French pictures we see adorable little Pilar-Morin.

The fact is the moving picture show of to-day consists only of the tools to carve out an artistic future. Some day the moving picture David Belasco, will appear and for his scenic spectacles he will not rely on a half-inch rubber hose in the hands of a supe to make waterfalls; he will have Niagara. And for his "back drop," if he likes and the story suits, he can have the Grand Canyon.—Los Angeles "Times."

ANNOUNCEMENT SLIDES, 1 CENT EACH.

Up-to-date theaters use them for announcing future programmes, for song chorus slides when the chorus slide is missing, for business advertising slides—in fact, for anything you desire to say to the audience. They are written on colored gelatin with a pen and ink or typewriter. They look well. Anyone can make them. Takes three minutes to make a slide. For three dollars ($3.00) cash with order, I send by express (charges not prepaid) as follows: 24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. F. H. RICHARDSON, No. 6 Bradhurst avenue, New York.

The long arm of coincidence is a piece of machinery successfully employed from time immemorial by writers of stage plays, novels, stories and other things prepared for our entertainment or amusement. Were it not for the long arm of coincidence, ninety out of every hundred plays that are offered to the public would not get where the managers place them: that is, the boards. Of course, you all know what the long arm of coincidence is? It is that "something," the uncertain, the unexpected, the incalculable, which happens just in the nick of time to save or create a dramatic sensation. And of course it is something, this long arm of coincidence, which does not happen in real life—or very rarely.

Life is not lived the way in which ninety out of these plays say it is. Or which ninety out of one hundred moving picture plays say it is. Life is not lived according to any formula. The only one certain thing in life is its inevitable finish. Let anybody who reads these lines and who has passed his two score, look back upon the life that he has lived, and he will concede that it has been nothing but a series of disconnected incidents that have arisen or have happened independently without reference one to the other. He has not lived his life in three, four or five symmetrical acts.

Don't for a moment think that this is a plea for excessive naturalism in the moving picture play. We all recognize that these things must be made more or less according to formula. They must have a beginning, middle and an end. An apparently unravelable plot, distinct types of characters, opportunities for acting. You can never get away from this formula in a moving picture plot; the public won't let you. They insist upon their plays being made according to formula. And liking a formula they necessarily demand the observance of the conventions. In other words, whilst the form of the moving picture play must take a certain shape or design, there must also be a certain plausibility or verisimilitude in the piece. It all comes to this: that the things that are set to happen on the moving picture screen are reasonably likely to happen in real life.

Two weeks ago I devoted this page to an analysis of the Imp picture, "The Double." I pointed out how exceedingly unlikely it was that a beautiful girl, presumably with a nice logical mind, could forget a martyred lover in ten minutes, and throw her arms around his successor's neck in less than the same space of time. This is an improbability. The moving picture public to-day will not stand for improbabilities. The moving picture producer must realize that he is working for a public just as critical as the ordinary theater public. But I started to speak of the long arm of coincidence. This is an obsolete theatrical trick that is creeping into the moving picture play. The long arm of coincidence is the cardinal sin of a very fine Powers picture, which is just about to be released, entitled, "When the World Sleeps." The Powers picture plays are increasing in favor in the moving picture field, because they are improving in consistent good qualities; the photography is improving; the settings are improving; the acting is improving. In fact, quietly and without ostentation, the Powers picture plays have forged right to the very head of the Independent product. And frankly, of their kind, I do not think a better picture is made in this country.

Still there is room for improvement in them. I would have them known as Powers probable picture plays. I would have the long arm of coincidence eliminated from them. Listen! Here, in a nutshell, is the story of "When the World Sleeps." A man is told by telegraph that he is $5,000 short on a stock exchange deal. If he does not find the money by to-morrow, he will be wiped out. The man's wife learns of her husband's dilemma. Simultaneously, contemporaneously, coincidentally, whichever you please, gentle reader, a guest arrives at the house to dine and sleep. Would you believe it, he carries with him a wallet containing exactly $5,000? Exactly $5,000! That is the very sum of which his host is short, and which he requires by to-morrow to prevent that unpleasant wiping out experience. Is not this a very extraordinary coincidence? Mind you, it is exactly $5,000, not $4,999 or $5,001, but exactly $5,000. "What do you know about that?"

Now, mark the play of the moving picture dramatist's mind. The guest—well, what do you think the guest does? He has that $5,000 deposited in his host's safe. Will the author tell us why? Was not the money safe in the guests's pocket? If not, why not? Did the guest mistrust his host or the honesty of those in the house? The author does not say. But he permits the inference that the guest was distrustful. Why? Anyhow the money is ostentatiously deposited in the safe, and all of us see it put there. Of course if it was not put into the safe, the play, as the sequel shows, would not go on. Similarly, if the guest had not brought that $5,000 with him, the play would not have been produced. A very extraordinary series of coincidences, indeed.

Well, the lady of the house gets to know of the presence of this $5,000 in the safe. Here comes in more coincidence. This lady walks in her sleep and in her sleep she walks straight to that safe and abstracts the $5,000, concealing it in a drawer in her bedroom. And oh, my! How nicey-nicey she looks in her nightie in her bedroom! Fie! Fie! Mr. Powers.

Of course on the morrow the guest, desiring to regain possession of his $5,000, discovers his loss. A detective is called in and there is much suspicion, confusion and misery. The climax of the play is brought about by a repetition of the somnambulistic eccentricities of the lady of the house. Again she walks in her sleep and in that condition restores the $5,000 to the safe. She is seen to do so by the men, who agree to say nothing of the incident. So the piece ends. The lady's good name is saved and the guest departs with his $5,000.

But what about the husband who is to find his $5,000 by to-morrow, or rather on the day on which the play closes! Remember he is to be wiped out. If so, the lady's somnambulistic adventures were pointless. The play therefore ends unsatisfactorily because the inference at its commencement was that the defaulting husband would be rescued from his unpleasant predicament. But he was not. So that, in addition to being burdened by somewhat unlikely coincidences, the play was left in an unfinished state.

This play was finely acted, finely staged and finely photographed, therefore it is all the more to be regretted that it was marred in the manner that I have pointed out—marred by improbabilities and extraordinary coincidences. Of course coincidences and improbabilities as glaring as those whch I am criticising do occur in real life. There is nothing impossible in "When the World Sleeps." Its faults are faults of construction. Let me offer a suggestion. It was not necessary for the husband to be short $5,000 for the success of the play. Eliminate that incident and you have a perfectly feasible drama. You eliminate the coincidences and the loose string which ends the play so unsatisfactorily. The entire play could have turned upon the disappearance of $5,000, at the hands of an innnocent somnambulist and its restoration by the same agency. Then it would have been as plausible, convincing and as excitable a stage play as you could wish to see. I hope nobody will think I am purposely assuming the cap of hypercriticism; that is, fault finding for fault finding's sake. My motive in writing this and similar artcles is to mprove or to assist in improving the technique of the moving picture play. Months ago I told the reader that I once earned my daily bread as a dramatic critic; that I had been a producer, a playwright, an author and all the rest of it—that, in fact, I had studied the subject I am writing about from all aspects. If I had not done this, I should not have presumed to criticise the Powers picture play or to write anything at all on the subject in these pages. So that when my friends, the producers, start to curse me, will they bear in mind the fact that I am writing from the vantage ground of years of experience and years of observation?

Chicago Notes.

We were rather surprised to see Thomas Ricketts walk into our offices, as we had an idea that he was somewhere taking pictures for the American Film Manufacturing Company. According to the statement of Mr. Ricketts, he has withdrawn from the American Film Manufacturing Company on good terms and he is now at liberty to consider any proposition. Mr. Ricketts will not long remain idle, as his success as the producer in the past of some of the best Essanay films, places him in a very enviable position and many manufacturers will be only too pleased to take advantage of this opportunity to improve their work, by placing Mr. Ricketts at the head of their producing department.

"One Drop Oil," a new product placed on the market by L. Riner, bids fair to be the most popular lubricator. This oil will not burn nor smoke nor smell, and to convince us of his claims, Mr. Riner gave us a practical demonstration, by dropping some of his oil on a burning match. The oil dropped on the match without being ignited and we could detect neither smoke nor odor. The Chicago film exchanges are stocking themselves with "One Drop Oil" and we are pleased to learn that some of the largest electric companies are buying same for their motors and fans, and the automobile trade has also recognized the merits of Mr. Riner's product.

When I saw Ambrosio's "Ave Maria," someone said: "Is it not too bad that they could not stretch the story to make it a full reel?" No, it was not too bad, as they would have dragged the action and would have made of this "Ave Maria" a sleepy production like "His Mother's Thanksgiving," another beautiful story, weakened by the manufacturer making it a full reel. We also note a lack of attention to the details: In "His Mother's Thanksgiving" is shown a very rich young man living in a mansion, yet the entrance door is the door of a very cheap cottage. Is it not ridiculous to show us such fine furniture and a uniformed butler to open such a cheap looking door? The young man is ashamed of his mother; she cannot sit at the same table with his guests; he takes her to an upper room, where the butler, posted on the unwelcome visit of the mother, serves her in private. Then the butler shows a lady guest into the same room. The mother writes to her son, telling of her going away. But why does she remain in the room? The producer missed the point. After the letter writing, he should have shown the mother in tears, in the corridor or stairway, as if in the act of sneaking away unseen. Then he should have made the lady guest, walking out from another room and meeting the mother, ask her the cause of her tears. With the arduous task of turning out so many reels per week, the producers cannot give proper thought to their work. Quality is not considered. They must have so many reels per week.

According to the latest reports, it would seem that the word "American" cannot be used in the film business outside of the Motion Picture Patents Company because the "American Film Service" uses the word American, therefore an injunction has been asked to restrain the American Film Manufacturing Company. The said American Film Service won a suit against an American Film Exchange, the contention being that both concerns were engaged in the same line of business, viz.: the renting of films. In the present case the contention should not hold good, as the American Film Service rents films, while the American Film Manufacturing Company manufactures films.

The "General" Buys an Overcoat.—An exhibitor, one of our regular visitors, on some of his recent calls, complained because he could not buy an overcoat, owing to the fact that he was barely making expenses instead of a profit in his theater. Last week he called as usual, only he came in smiling, wearing a new overcoat of the latest pattern. He hastened to explain that he had "gone Independent" and through the fine pictures he was receiving (service through Standard Film Exchange) his business had increased to such an extent that he was able to buy an overcoat from the first week's profit.

Who said the moving picture people are not generous and charitable? One has only to walk past some of the film exchanges on Clark street in Chicago to satisfy himself that they are. Two of the exchanges on that street have their windows full of large advertising cards, advertising the attractions at the various opera houses. Isn't it kind of the exchanges to "boost the drama"? And especially when the theatrical people "boost" (?) the moving picture business. But, I think I've guessed it. Maybe Mr. Exchange Man gets a comp. or two, and my second "maybe" is: Maybe he needs them.

The Grand Theater, Springfield, Ill., has again reopened its doors after having been closed to allow of the making of extensive improvements. The interior has been remodeled, a new front put in, and with the addition of a Mirror Screen installed last week, Kunz Bros. have a picture house that they may well feel proud of. We are informed that they are playing to capacity, showing excellent, well selected Independent releases, furnished by the H. & H. Film Exchange, of Chicago.

Again the Missing Titles.—A certain gentleman could perhaps give us an answer to "Where Are the Titles?" He is the correspondent of a certain trade paper, spending most of his time at the offices of the General Film Company when he is not at a certain restaurant on Randolph street, where, over the lunches, he is told what he should do or say. From reliable sources we understand that the General Film Company did not increase sufficiently its purchases after taking on more exchanges, consequently, with a limited stock, the films have to be hurried from one customer to another without time to inspect them. This is perhaps the reason why on Monday evening the Pastime on Adams street, although advertising two reels, showed only one, a Kalem minus its title. When the film was over, an intermission of three minutes was announced, then a new show started with the same old Kalem film, minus its title. Would this infer that the second reel was in still worse condition and could not be shown?

Chicago Operators' Union, No. 145, held an open mass meeting Thursday morning, November 17, in their hall on Dearborn street, which was very well attended by a large number of exhibitors, managers, and operators. Several interesting talks were made by the officers of the union and others present, and the new agreement which is being entered into between the union and exhibitors employing union operators was discussed from many different viewpoints. This agreement is one of the fairest propositions of its kind I have ever seen; the exhibitor is protected equally as much as the union. Undoubtedly this "Get together" meeting will be productive of good results to all the parties concerned, and Chicago local should make it a rule to hold one every thirty or sixty days.

The makers of the Motiograph are great believers in quality, and as a consequence their plant is exceedingly complete. Instead of following a policy of having vital parts of their machine made at outside shops, which is done by many manufacturers, the Enterprise people have invested thousands of dollars in machinery in order to gain the accuracy desired in the fitting of the parts, which is impossible where the work is split up in several shops. It is such care as this which has resulted in establishing the high standard set by the Motiograph in the motion picture machine field.

"ALL JOIN IN THE CHORUS."

Now it's the censorship of the illustrated song slides. Monday evening the censorship board of the Chicago Police Department inaugurated a crusade against objectionable illustrated songs, and it is their intention to visit every picture theater in the city and place their stamp of disapproval on every slide that is the least suggestive or improper. I earnestly hope they will be very successful, for what is worse than to sit in a theater and after seeing a good picture, have your entertainment spoiled by having to listen to maudlin drivel? The Police Department should go after the publishers of these songs. C. P. McDonald, of the "Show World," is doing a lot of good work in this direction, exposing and lambasting some of the "current smut writers" as he terms them. May the good work go on.

Los Angeles, Cal.—"Clune's Broadway" is the name of the new moving picture theater here which has just been completed for Mr. Clune, this making his second house in this city. Both have a seating capacity of 900 and are as handsome and well equipped theaters as can be found anywhere. A special feature of the equipment of the "Broadway" is the electric sign, which is one of the largest ever constructed. A third theater for Mr. Clune is in course of construction in Pasadena, which will have a seating capacity of 1,500. The Pacific Coast is taking a first place in the magnificence and style of its moving picture houses.

New England Notes.

"VAUDEVILLE—MUSIC—UNIFORMS."

In the issue of the World dated November 19, the Western representative of this paper, John M. Bradlet, has written an able article on "Vaudeville—Music—Uniforms." Although "Henry," the World's New England representative, is practically new to readers of this journal, and cannot yet expect to gain as careful a listening as his confrere in the West, yet he feels that a few words anent Mr. Bradlet's article might be of general interest—showing, as they will, how different sections of this country vary in conditions. To come right out with the fact we have felt for some time by what we have heard and read, that the Northeastern States had reached a higher state of excellence in the building and conducting of moving picture theaters than had that section of the country in and around Chicago. Mr. Bradlet's article makes the belief change to almost a certainty. In the first place, about this use of vaudeville: In the Northeast in general, and in Boston in particular, practically every house now uses, and has used vaudeville for over two years. It would seem that such a space of time is enough to see whether vaudeville per se injures the box office receipts. We must say that it is beneficial, not the reverse, else vaudeville would have made its exit ere this. Mr. Bradlet informs us that the very opposite holds sway in Chicago. We notice that Mr. Bradlet carefully states: "We have fought against cheap vaudeville." That is the main point—cheap vaudeville. We do not believe that vaudeville can be injurious in the West, and helpful here. That would be theorizing too much. The quality of the vaudeville used is what makes this difference in the West and East. The writer—who does not know overmuch about vaudeville in general—has never seen what is called a "Chicago act"—one coming from that city. He has, however, seen "New York acts." If the truth be told, their success was hardly noticeable in Northeastern moving picture houses. A booking agent, whom we happen to know, told us that a New York act, playing the "moving picture time" in that city, and which was considered O. K. there, would fall down badly when brought over to Boston. We do not personally know if this is always the case, but the very great majority of moving picture managers in and around Boston, whom we interviewed before writing this, told us that it was reliable in their experience. These facts have been written only to show that we think that we have better vaudeville in the Northeastern houses than in some other sections of the country. That is why vaudeville does not injure the exhibitors hereabouts. The World's Northeastern representative's views on vaudeville in connection with moving pictures is that vaudeville is not of necessity detrimental if it is used moderately, of good quality, and given in addition to the regular program of pictures. His article on this subject can be found on page 1183 in the World of November 19, entitled, "Why Vaudeville Is Detrimental." It would seem, therefore, that Northeastern exhibitors are ready to buy more expensive acts than are the Western brothers. In the second place, about the music, Mr. Bradlet states: "The old style of a self-playing piano, or of a cheap pianist playing a ragtime tune, are things of the past." The writer has been visiting moving picture theaters in the Northeast for three years and more, but it has never been his fortune (or misfortune) to hear a self-playing piano in use in a moving picture house. The houses now are using, as they did since their opening, a pianist and trap-drummer, while a few have full orchestras. Such pieces as "Poet and Peasant," Sextet from "Lucia," etc., are of every-day occurrence.

We wish to most emphatically give the fullest measure of credit to the editors of the World, as does Mr. Bradlet, for writing so much in favor of uniformed employees in moving picture houses. The tenor of Mr. Bradlet's remarks anent uniforms seem to show that the general uniforming of moving picture employees is just now beginning to be quite generally adopted. It is different here. Take Boston, for instance. The first house built in that city was the Theater Comique, over three years ago. From its opening day its ushers, porters, doorkeepers and special policemen were uniformed. No moving picture theater has opened in that city whose employees were not uniformed. The same holds true of the whole Northeastern section.

We are glad to note that exhibitors are requesting Mr. Bradlet's attendance at their houses, and forward checks to cover the costs. I wish I could send him a check to cover a Boston trip. I think we could surprise and gladden him. From time to time, photographs and write-ups of Northeastern moving picture theaters will be published in the World. Without saying more, the fronts will surprise many readers for the beauty and excellence of design. The fact that practically every Boston moving picture theater, built especially for the exhibition of photoplay, has yearly expenses of about $70,000 to $75,000, probably accounts for the fact that they are leading the other cities in some respects. This article was written for only one purpose—to show readers of the World, who live everywhere throughout this country, that conditions vary greatly. We hope Mr. Bradlet will not "come back" at us too severely some time for this effort.

In closing, let the writer state that we have many faults in the East—not the least of which are outrageous posters used by many houses, the daily change mania; slovenly work as far as the illustrated song is concerned, and many other evils. We simply point these out briefly (we shall speak fully of them in the future) that the reader may not think we are narrow or prejudiced. We claim to be above that, caring only for the stability of the business, not whether Boston is superior to Chicago or vice versa. The industry is an only love—not its geographical location. HENRY.

BOSTON.

The fire which broke out in the operating room of the Theater Comique Saturday, November 19, at 9:10 p. m., was the first in any Boston moving picture house. The usual amount of panic followed, and a wild rush for the exits was made. Several women fainted, as the men pushed and crowded too severely. The fire was caused by some explosion of the reels in the booth. Several reels of Independent films were totally burned, and the machinery badly damaged; the loss is estimated at $1,000, without taking into consideration the loss of business. Miss Marion Filmore, an illustrated singer, is to be commended for the calm way in which she tried to quell the disturbance, by speaking to the audience from the stage. The house was closed for the remainder of the evening. Although Mr. Mosher, general manager for the Comique, stated that the house would be open for the usual Sunday concert, it was found impossible to do so. At the present writing, Monday p. m., November 21, the house is "dark." Crossed wires is causing the delay, as all signs of the flames have been removed. Although moving picture operators consider themselves much maligned by the criticisms sometimes seen in the World, yet they were guilty of bad omissions in this instance. The operators at the Comique have already lost their licenses to operate. The cause is given as gross carelessness in conducting their work. The Comique is controlled by the Automatic Vaudeville Company of New York City, Emil Shauer, treasurer; Morris Kohn, president.

The express strike has been severely felt in Boston this week. The reels arrived late, and hardly ever on scheduled time. The film exchanges are to be commended for their handling of the situation. As the reels came to hand, one by one, the exchanges would immediately notify their first run customers by telephone, and would arrange to run off the reels for inspection at some convenient time. Boston managers state that they are living in the exchange offices, waiting for the reels to come in. However, no reels have come in so late that it was found impossible to exhibit them on regular release dates.

IN MEMORIAM.

Mrs. Mary C. Keith, wife of B. F. Keith, died November 16, at her residence, 310 Kent street, Brookline. Mrs. Keith had been in poor health for some time, but her death was entirely unexpected. Her death will be greatly felt by the poor, as Mrs. Keith was much devoted to them, and gave much to charity.

THE FUTURE EMPEROR OF GERMANY FACILITATES MOTION PHOTOGRAPHING OF ARMY.

Crown Prince William of Germany, during recent army maneuvers, ordered a special disposition of troops to enable the photographer of a film company to secure good pictures. The prince also had a firing exercise carried out with blank cartridges in order to make the picture of a battery in action realistic.

Herr Von Lammendorf, the manager of the film company in Germany, under whose direction the pictures were taken, says that fully 80 per cent. of the films have already been sold in America, the rest going to France and England.

It should further be added that Prince William took a conspicuous position at the head of the army and thereby gave a thoroughness to the value of the pictures, also showing due appreciation in high military circles of the usefulness in military tactics of the cinematograph, besides its exhibitive interest.

Names To Conjure With And To Do Business With

ilding, 4th Avenue and 14th Street, New York

"The Stolen Claim" (Edison).—A Canadian picture centering around a silver mine suspended on a cliff 1,500 feet in the air. The interest is chiefly in the doctor. When called to go to attend the man who destroyed his happiness he does it without flinching. Perhaps, as teaching the truth that sin is frequently punished in this life, retribution follows the false friend and even though he recovers from the effects of the accident he plunges over the cliff to destruction. As might be expected the two lovers are reunited.

"Love at First Sight" (Essanay).—A mixup in love affairs following the answering of a matrimonial advertisement.

"Drumsticks" (Vitagraph).—A pathetic Thanksgiving story which ends so well that the sorrow of the first part is forgotten in the joyous reunion that graces the close of the film. It is dramatic in the sudden turning of the child's grief to joy. It is a good Thanksgiving film and seems to touch the hearts of the people in the audience.

"The Troublesome Baby" (Biograph).—A comedy depicting the difficulties into which a gentleman is plunged when he holds a baby for another woman and his wife appears and discovers him in this philanthropic occupation. But explanations ease matters and the troublesome baby no longer exerts his malign influence.

"Right in Front of Father" (Lubin).—A snappy comedy which represents serious obstructions to the course of true love in the strenous objections of both fathers. But by exchanging clothes the young people get married right in front of father, both being called in as witnesses. The novelty is in the means taken to overcome the objections, not in the obstructionist methods of the parents.

"His Sergeant's Stripes" (Melies).—A love story, with a pathetic ending. The young soldier wins his sergeant's stripes by his bravery and his devotion to duty, and would have won the girl he loved, but they found his lifeless body. He was killed by the Indians who helped to obtain the important dispatches he carried. The sympathies of the audience are visibly moved and it is clear that they experienced something akin to real grief when the soldier is found dead.

"Gratitude" (Selig).—A story of the red man and a miner in which gratitude for favors conferred plays an important part. The film is attractive scenically since the picture was made in the mining country and is, therefore, realistic and true to life. Care was exercised in the Indian costumes, and no slips were detected in this regard. The squaw's successful efforts to prevent the unscrupulous mine owner from taking away the miner's wife entrusted to her care form a strongly dramatic feature.

"The Toymaker, the Doll and the Devil" (Edison).—A complication arising from mixing up a love affair, a masquerade ball and the belief of an old toymaker that his creations could be endowed with life. The apprentice, through impersonating the devil. succeeds in winning the old man's consent to the wedding he most desires. The impersonation of the doll by the girl is too improbable to put over on an intelligent audience, even if it was original, which it is not.

"Jim Bridger's Indian Bride" (Kalem).—An Indian story based upon an incident described in a well known Indian history. The main interest probably centers in the careful reproduction of Indian life.

"Phaedra" (Pathe).—A story from the ancient Greek, depicting the legend of Hyppolytus. Greek students will understand it, but to a considerable proportion of the average audience it is merely a series of pictures in which the scenery may be presumed to be Greek, but the picture might mean almost anything. The sub-titles help, but they do not make the picture altogether clear. Why Poseidon makes the waves frighten the horses is not understood, and why the false Phaedra kills herself is another unsolved mystery.

"Military Cyclists in Belgium" (Pathe).—A picture reproducing the drill of a motor cycle corps of the Belgian army. Any audience will be interested in the evolutions which are altogether new to most who will see it.

"A Modern Courtship" (Vitagraph).—A love tale based upon a woman's objection to a bald head. After various disappointments with tonics the young man buys a wig. The denouement shows the young woman also wearing a wig. Then realizing that a pair is a winner they decide to marry.

"The Bum and the Bomb" (Vitagraph).—A helter skelter chase film in which a tramp, who has fooled numerous people with a fake bomb, is led away to prison to repent of his misdeeds.

"The Little Prospector" (Essanay).—A picture, the scenes of which are laid among the gold mines and center around the pluck of a girl who manages to stake a claim on which her father has found gold before other prospectors reach it. There is one thrilling scene, the race between the young man and the young woman to reach the claim before the others. They do it, however, and the claim is staked before the greedy prospectors are able to get it away from them.

"Lisbon Before and After the Revolution" (Gaumont).—A series of views which will give a good idea of what the Portuguese capital was like before the revolutionists did their work, and another series made afterward with the marks of the rough work in the city plainly visible.

"Spain's Loyalty" (Gaumont).—Illustrations of the various ceremonies by which Spanish troops pledge allegiance to their sovereign.

"Song of the Wildwood Flute" (Biograph).—An Indian picture which touches upon the gentler side of the red man's character, showing him as a lover and introducing some of the little-known customs connected with his wooing. So far as can be judged from once seeing it the details are worked out with care and these customs seem accurately depicted. The ending is happy, leaving a favorable impression.

"Caught by the Camera" (Lubin).—A telltale plate that was proof of a man's crime which, because of jealousy, he allowed to be charged to another. The complication in the love affairs of those concerned is eventually untangled, with the exception of the girl who develops the telltale plate. She must suffer regardless of her self-sacrifice.

"The Old Longshoreman" (Pathe).—Old, unable to work and starving, the man drops dead just after rescuing a child from drowning. It is not quite plain where the interest is supposed to be in this picture, excepting possibly in the illustrations of always attractive docks.

"New South Wales Gold Mine" (Pathe).—An educational film, showing how they mine gold in that far away country. The illustrations afford opportunity to see what is done under modern conditions.

"No Place Like Home" (Selig).—A comedy depicting the adventures of a man who went away from home to get a rest. He got anything but that and was glad to get back to his own house, with its six children, as many another has been before him.

"The Dull Razor" (Selig).—A farce, representing the trials of a man who attempts to shave with a dull razor.

"Through the Clouds" (Edison).—A film with a modern setting indeed, including an aeroplane and an automobile in its action. Then, too, it has a fair representation of American politics, the combination keeping the audience interested throughout.

"The Lad from Old Ireland" (Kalem).—The much-heralded production of this house which sent its stock company to Ireland last Summer to obtain the Irish scenes. It is the story of an Irish boy who comes to America to seek his fortune, finds it and returns to Ireland in time to save his sweetheart from eviction. Its chief interest lies in the scenery. Probably most audiences will enjoy it, and of course the Irish lad will make the Irish portion of any audience hilarious.

"How Rastus Got His Turkey" (Pathe).—A comedy by the American company which tells the story of a darkey who stole his Thanksgiving turkey, the most interesting scene of which is where they all sit about the table stowing it away.

"Wonderful Plates" (Pathe).—A colored film presenting a series of pictures on plates. As the little Gretchen wipes her beautiful delft ware the figures move quite to her surprise Then she falls asleep and dreams of the wonders she has seen.

"Behind a Mask" (Urban).—The story of a duel. The husband being called away and unable to fight, the wife, the insulted party, dons a mask and fights her traducer, beating him in the contest.

"Nantes and Its Surroundings" (Urban).—A good picture of this French city with many of its most striking features well reproduced. A good impression of the city's most interesting features can be obtained from this film.

INDEPENDENT.

"The Girl from the East" (Nestor).—This was a spirited girl and she didn't purpose marrying the man her father selected, accordingly she flies to the West and there selects her own man. When her father announces his speedy arrival with the man of his choice she, with the help of her lover and an actor friend, succeeds in arranging a scheme to prevent this. The result is the girl marries the man of her choice, and her father, instead of raging, compliments her upon her spirit and independence. The story is a good one and well told and will no doubt prove an interesting and somewhat novel addition to the flood of Western films.

"That Doggone Dog" (Atlas).—A comedy representing what happens to a tramp who steals and eats a portion of dog meat. He is transformed into a man-dog, and to secure him from harming himself or others he is captured in a net by the dog-catcher and hurried away in the wagon. Such ridiculous and far-fetched attempts at comedy belong to the buried past. Even Lubin no longer gives us such bunk; why should a modern and intelligent manufacturer?

"Caught by Cowboys" (Champion).—While this is a so-called Western film, it must be admitted that it abounds in interesting situations and develops more interest than some of them do. The shooting of a man hanging from a ledge may be an act of simple justice under certain conditions, but it doesn't leave a pleasant sensation. The capture of the man and his escape from lynching through the intervention of the man he had wronged are sufficiently dramatic to be good. Perhaps the most striking feature of most of the later Western films is the fact that lynching has practically become a thing of the past. Sometimes it is suggested, but it is no longer enacted in full view of the audience as it was two years ago. Suggestion is sufficient to maintain the dramatic unities.

"Tweedledum's Corporation Duty" (Ambrosio).—This favorite comedian appears in a new situation, as funny as it is novel. Before the picture ends the audience learns more of his humorous side than it ever knew before, and gets a hearty laugh from his comicalities. This picture will serve to heighten up an otherwise heavy program and will keep an audience in rare good humor.

"The Hand of Providence" (Atlas).—A stirring film presenting a fierce fight over a woman from which one man was carried home on a stretcher. Later comes another meeting followed by a murder, from which the man is led away. But he escapes and, exchanging clothes with a dead man, is reported dead. The woman marries again, supposing herself free, but afterward the escaped convict enters the house as a burglar. Fortunately he is driven away before the woman recognizes him. Melodramatic in the extreme, this picture holds the attention of the audience from beginning to end.

"The Way of the West" (Champion).—A Western love story representing the dangerous, almost fatal, indecision of a girl regarding her lovers. She is roughly handled by one whom she rejects and is kidnapped and forced to fight for her honor by the other. Leaping from a window she lands in the arms of the first and, having discovered after sending him away that she loves him, she agrees to marry him. The kidnapper is forgiven, there is a merry wedding and the film ends happily. The suggestive portion where the girl is fighting the desperate lover spoils the film. The rest of it makes a good story without objectionable features; but that scene should be changed. It is too suggestive to be shown to a mixed audience. As has been pointed out before, it is not pleasant or desirble to see women struggle with men to protect themselves. It savors too much of swashbuckling and piratical times. If that scene were modified so as to express the same thing without showing it, we would have nothing but praise for the picture.

"The Ranchman's Bride" (Nestor).—The story of a ranchman who was badly taken in by the adventuress. And the brother who had been driven away as of no use appears and restores things to their original status. The story is interesting and told with spirit by the actors. It attracts favorable attention and the audience is ready to applaud when the wronged brother is the one who helps them all out of trouble.

"The Lure of the City" (American).—Here is told a dramatic story which goes to the heart of everyone who sees it. Perhaps everyone has felt the lure of the city, but not many have also felt the peace and inspiration of the seclusion of the mountains. The young mountaineer typifies the strong manhood that is constantly going to the city from the country. While they do not cause riots it will probably be admitted that their vigor does exert a tendency towards such an upset of established conditions that they are not altogether welcome. It is natural, too, that the city girl should fall in love wih the country man. The picture presents no improbability in that direction. Whether the flight to the country and their decision to remain there is as strong an ending as it would be to see them go back and conquer the turbulent spirits together, may be an open question. There is something soothing in the thought that henceforth they are done with strife. On the other hand, some will feel that the picture would have gained to have seen these two strong characters return to the scene of disorder and force the disturbing elements to be quiet. It is sweet to rest in peace. It is noble to fight a battle for the right; and whether the fight be won or lost, the one who makes the attempt is entitled to whatever honors may be bestowed. It doesn't seem exactly right to see this strong man running to the hills for shelter because a mob, like curs, is snapping at his heels. It would be more exciting and supply a stronger climax to see him turn upon them and by sheer force of dominant will cow them into submission.

"The Education of Mary Jane" (Defender).—An interesting story of a country girl, whose city husband tired of her because of her simplicity, and who sought and obtained a city education. But his nobility showed he deserved her since when she appeared to him he took her in his arms. The audience is then in the proper frame of mind to rejoice with him when she throws off her disguise and appears a cultured young woman. It seems a story of real life, dramatic in the straightforward tale it tells, rather than in exciting climaxes or emotional scenes. It is interesting, too, in the emphasis which is shown between the country girl and the same one educated in the ways of the world.

"Fortune's Wheel" (Imp).—An extremely realistic picture, presenting with startling vividness the differences in fortune which may develop at unexpected times. In depicting the fortunes of two brothers, and emphasizing their heartlessness when fortune smiles upon them, the film presents a transcript of actual life. The intervention of the child in the closing scenes which leads to the bestowal of the assistance so much needed and the reconciliation is a human touch which appeals strongly to the emotions and unconsciously arouses the kindliest sentiments. The actors have interpreted the sentiment of this picture with startling accuracy and the sympahies of the audience are worked upon with a force which cannot be overcome. Dramatically this picture is one of the strongest of the week. Perhaps in its power to move an audience it is the strongest of them all.

"Bill as a Lover" (Lux).—Lovers are often persistent, but few ever adopt the method of this small comedian to get his charmer, namely, be carried to her home in a hat box. All sorts of disagreeable experiences await him, but he at last arrives and his woebegone appearance as he emerges from the box works on the girl's sympathies until she relents and his persistence is rewarded.

"Blopps in Search of the Black Hand" (Lux).—A comedy presenting the fear excited in Mr. Blopps' mind by the discovery of two blackhand imprints. A detective is called in and exhausts all the expedients of story sleuths in searching for the perpetrator of the supposed outrage. At last the mystery is cleared up and Mr. Blopps, freed from his overwhelming fear, is ready to be genial again.

"The City of Her Dreams" (Thanhouser).—A clear presentation of the visions of a child who wanted to go to the city. The vision is, perhaps, more beatific than the actual city, but it unquestionably represents the imagined city of those who have never seen it. The awakening was rude, but happily the vision becomes real when the father appears with sufficient money to take the dreamer to the city for which she has longed. The acting and mechanical work on this picture are both of excellent quality.

"Her Father's Sin" (Solax).—A film which graphically illustrates the old law of the sins of the fathers being visited upon the sons. The beauty and simplicity of the heroine will appeal almost irresistibly and the insolence of the officer will arouse resentment. The noble young clergyman and his solution of the difficulty will satisfy most persons as being eminently correct. The attitude of the world toward an unfortunate is typified in the outraged sensibilities of the good sisters of the church. The picture is so true to real life that in places it is unpleasant, yet possesses a fascination. And when the young minister makes the unfortunate girl his bride there is a relief from the intense emotion which characterizes the effect of the film throughout.

"The Diamond Swindler" (Great Northern).—A snappy detective story in which Harry Traxton, a clever pupil of Sherlock Holmes, ferrets out a swindler and brings him to justice in a series of interesting scenes. The acting is excellent, and in common with other detective stories produced by this house this one holds the audience from the beginning to the end. The Great Northern people have an established reputation for detective stories and this picture will help in maintaining the reputation.

"Foolshead a Victim of His Honesty" (Itala).—Again this comedian appears in a picture that is really funny. He never fails to keep the audience laughing. This one, showing what happened to him because he was honest, is quite as funny as those which have preceded it.

"Thou Shalt Not Kill" (Powers).—A drama which deals with an old command in a way to hold the attention undivided from beginning to end. There are scenes in it which will make anyone think and the story is interesting as it works out to the finis, exemplifying the command. Acted with spirit and clearly photographed, the picture promises to be as popular as others of the same house which have gone before.

"Absent Minded Arthur" (Powers).—The queer things an absent minded person will do are clearly exemplified and the audience gets an exhibition of something funny as the film runs.

"Starlight's Devotion" (American).—An Indian story, representing the love of an Indian maiden for a white man and depicting with much dramatic power her sacrifice in giving him up to the white girl whom he left in the East. There is a heart pathos in this picture which holds the audience in its spell until the close. The acting of the Indian girl's part is singularly attractive, and the closing scene, where she is crooning under the tree where she nursed Dick back to life, leaves few dry eyes in the house. Those who see beyond the mere outward representation will appreciate the heartache which the Indian girl suffers. Fortunately the man is unconscious of what he had done, else the audience would scarcely tolerate his action. The scenic features are good, presenting reproductions of Western landscapes in a satisfactory way.

"The Exiled Mother" (Eclaire).—The sympathy of your audience will be aroused at the beginning and will follow the unjustly treated mother through all her vicissitudes until she and her husband are reconciled. It is a feature which adds interest to the picture that the mother in disguise is engaged as governess. The reconciliation is touching and will play upon the emotions with more than usual strength.

"Their Day of Thanksgiving" (Imp).—Generosity in this instance came near being the undoing of the couple who were kind enough to think of others, even in their extremity. After both birds are given away another is sent. Thus the day ends happily after it appeared rather dark and foreboding.

"Lone Wolf's Trust" (Yankee).—A Western picture representing an Indian as bringing up a white boy, keeping his parentage secret until the young man reaches a specified age. A love affair holds the attention for a considerable proportion of the time, but is happily settled at the end. The fall from the cliff and the subsequent care of the Indian are both interesting features. The fall is a thrill. The Indian's devotion increases the heart interest, which is maintained by the love story and finally consummated in the wedding.

"Cast Thy Bread Upon the Waters" (Atlas).—A touching picture which seems to go far to prove the assertion that bread cast upon the waters will return after many days. A story like this, where the man remembers the kindness done to the boy and repays it in kind, always pleases, and when the successful man discovers his old friends in want and relieves their distress he wins the good will and the applause of the audience. The Atlas Company has worked out the story with care in the details and apparently has developed the situations as acceptably as possible, and it was enjoyed by the audience.

"Let Us Give Thanks" (Champion).—A Thanksgiving story that begins in sadness and ends in gladness. It begins in a young man's disgrace and ends in his redemption and restoration to manhood. A tender love story runs through it and there is an inspiring reproduction of a young man working his way up from drunkenness to full manhood again. It is a little preachy, perhaps, and may, for that reason, be a bit prosy in places. But the main thread of the story is interesting because of its heart interest, and when the picture closes with all sitting about the Thanksgiving table there is a homelike appearance about it all.

"A Deal in Indians" (Nestor).—A love story and a lively comedy in which a real and a fake Indian perform important parts. The film possesses little claim to dramatic strength, but it is lively and develops some novel situations which interest and amuse.

THE ATLAS TURKEY.

The Atlas Company were one of the few film making companies who, this year, produced a seasonable picture—that is, a picture appropriate to Thanksgiving; and the Atlas Company, we venture to think, were fortunate in respect of the fact that we, more by accident than anything else, saw this picture a day or two before its release. We were glad to see it, because it gives us an opportunity of editorially congratulating the Atlas Company on their steady progress in the photographic and dramatic sides of moving picture making. The Atlas turkey film, which is entitled "Cast Thy Bread Upon the Waters," should not only be popular during Thanksgiving season, but it should go well with the exhibitors and exchanges round about Christmas and New Year. For the sentiment of the picture is racy of the festive season at the end of the year.

It is the story of the complications that ensue when a boy, to help his mother, steals a turkey. Out of evil cometh good. The boy, though caught, is let off. He succeeds in life as a man, and ultimately he is enabled to help his benefactors by the indirect gift to them of turkeys and other good things. The picture will succeed in virtue of its sentiment.

There is some good direct acting in the story, which is crowded with characters drawn from the humbler ranks of life. You see the interior of a police court; the interior of a poor home, etc. As we have already hinted, it is a story showing how the sentiment of a season may soften the asperities of life.

Exchanges who procure the Atlas, "Cast Thy Bread Upon the Waters," may be sure that great popularity will attach to this subject for many weeks to come.

PLANS FOR MOVING PICTURE THEATERS.

Strange as it may seem to experienced photoplay exhibitors, it is nevertheless a fact that many theaters are erected in which the operating booth is an after-thought. J. H. Hallberg, the "Economizer" man, told the writer of a case over in New Jersey where the theater was finished and the exhibitor then asked where he should locate the booth, and, "Believe me," said Mr. Hallberg, "he was obliged to do considerable scheming in order to place the booth so as to project a picture properly." In this connection, Mr. Hallberg informed the writer that he is every day in receipt of letters from prospective exhibitors asking for his advice in the building and arrangement of the equipment. Where he simply acts as consulting engineer, of course, Mr. Hallberg charges for his services, but where his advice and experience are called for in connection with the sale of an equipment, no extra charge is made. Too much stress cannot be laid to the importance of getting started right in the motion picture business, and saving the necessity of later changes.

Reading, Pa., Nov. 1, 1910.—The firm heretofore known as Stetler & Zerr, Empire Theater, Reading, Pa., has been dissolved. After this date the business will be continued as a moving picture theater by F. E. Stetler, the surviving partner, under the same title, Empire Theater, Reading, Pa. All future communications pertaining to the said business as well as all future purchases made from the above date should be addressed and charged to the said F. E. Stetler, Empire Theater, Reading, Pa.

Lancaster, Pa.—A moving picture theater, 49 x 90 feet, and to cost about ten thousand dollars, is being erected by M. J. Kuhn, 516 East Chestnut street, who would be pleased to hear in regard to equipment and supplies.

NOTES FROM THE CENTRAL STATES.

W. M. Sauvage, of Alton, Ill., an amusement magnate of some prominence in the Mississippi Valley, has completed his Lyric at Alton and opened it to the public. Cork carpets in the rear to deaden the sounds of late comers supplement the rich carpets in the aisles. The walls of the operator's booth are of Kelastone over six inches thick. Figures plastique set off the stage and the lobby.

Roy Payne, of Lexington, Ill., and D. J. Starkey, of Chenoa, Ill., have purchased of Clagget & Dexter, of Lexington, the moving picture show in Chenoa.

W. O. Stevens, of Henry, Ill., has secured a lease on a moving picture show in Pekin, Ill., and now is operating eight photoplay houses in Illinois. An eight-piece orchestra will be a feature of the show at Pekin.

Fred Ingram, of Colfax, has purchased the Nickeldome at that place and will move it to the Central Opera House.

The Scenic Theater at Coal City, Ill., has been reopened. This place was hit by the hard times in the Illinois mining strike and forced to close for the Summer.

M. M. Quinn, proprietor of the Idle Hour, Lockport, Ill., is featuring educational and high grade films. He announces to the public that he has children of his own and gives nothing to his patrons that he would not wish his own family to see and hear.

Manager Howard, of the Bijou, at Monmouth, Ill., is adding fifty seats to the capacity of his house by remodelling the interior.

J. L. Groover and Simon Black have opened a photoplay theater at 27 South Main street, Canton, Ill., which will be known as the Lyric.

Beck & Blocker, of Davenport, Ia., have leased the Auditorium at Morrison, Ill., and when the playhouse is not otherwise engaged will show moving pictures.

Mrs. Nellie Billan, of Connorsville, Ind., has purchased the Bijou, at Mattoon, Ill., and after having the place remodelled will operate the theater. She successfully managed a picture house at North Vernon, Ind., before coming to Illinois.

C. C. Coyne, of Moline, Ill., has purchased property at 2319 Fifth avenue in that city and will remodel the building for a moving picture theater. August Miedke and Lee Woodyatt leased property at Sixth avenue and Sixteenth street and will erect a theater seating 600 to 700 persons. It will be opened about November 12 as a five-cent photoplay theater. The proprietors are musicians. This will make six picture shows for Moline. Harry Sodini is also said to be planning to open a show in the Pierr building now under construction.

Morton Harvey, manager of the Colonial and Colonnade theaters in Decatur, Ill., has invited a committee of six or more members from the Woman's Civic League, which has made a plea for clean photoplays, to censor all films shown in the two houses. A special run will be made each morning for this body if desired.

W. Sims, of Staunton, Ill., has purchased the Main Street Electric Theater at Edwardsville, Ill., of Arthur Gillespie, of the latter city.

Jud L. McClinton has purchased the interest of J. C. Payne in the Crystal Theater at Waterloo, Ia.

Upon the recommendation of Dr. P. M. Hall, city health commissioner of Minneapolis, Minn., who saw the film "The Man Who Learned" at the recent convention of the American Public Health Association in Milwaukee, the Minneapolis Woman's Club will present the picture in theaters in that city. Dr. Hall is enthusiastic over the value of this subject as a factor in improving the sanitary conditions throughout the country by awakening the public to a demand for cleanliness.

Moving pictures, the good roads movement and the concentration of the school system are combined in Texas. The commercial bodies of Texas cities organized scheduled tours for caravans of six or more motor cars embracing a radius of thirty miles or more about each municipality. A complete moving picture show was carried and the several thousand feet of film showing the hair-raising condition of unimproved roads, together with the means of making better highways, were shown. With better roads it is urged the schools can be more easily reached, more easily consolidated and better facilities for education obtained. F. H. M.

Mayor Seidel, of Milwaukee, Wis., has announced that the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures, not even the censored films, can be shown in that city.

FLICKERS.

A Brooklyn judge complains that the Brooklyn wives spend so much time at picture shows that the Brooklyn husband is forced to be content with a delicatessen dinner. Is that a slap at moving pictures, or is it another slander on the fair city that has already been insulted for having too many trolley-cars, rubber plants, baby carriages and churches?

Another of the moving picture shows which have been held weekly by the Ridley Park Fire Company will be held to-morrow evening in the fire house.—Ridley Park cor. Chester (Pa.) Times.

Now then, what we want to know is how much they raised the insurance on the fire house

It begins to appear that every city must have its moving picture censorship spasm, just the same as every baby has to go through its teething, whooping-cough, and all that sort of thing.

The secretary of the Northwest Washington Citizens' Association, Mr. S. Sowerbutts, has arrived at the weighty conclusion that "Crime is not the proper subject for the contemplation of infant minds."

Oh, lofty thought! The name of "S. Sowerbutts," as applied to a moving picture reformer, is not only a classic, but an inspiration. We wonder what relation he is to "Adam Sowerguy."

* * *

The surest way to secure the repeal of an unjust measure is to enforce it with a vengeance and let public opinion do the rest.

With all the moving picture regulation, suppression, condemnation and crusading, it is surprising how many exhibitors still remain out of jail. But more surprising than that is the amount of hot air that can be put into circulation by a notoriety-seeking reformer.

Speaking about barring fight and topical crime pictures; how would the public know anything about fights or crime if it were not for the newspapers? It is a simple case of supply and demand. The newspapers supply the fight and crime news and the public demand more.

"In front of a 10-cent moving picture theater on State street there is displayed a striking lithograph of Miss Fritzi Scheff, bearing this inscription: "This week, Mazie Rodney, in songs—and, believe me, she is some singer."—Percy Hammond, Chicago Tribune.

A boy may be doing wrong in peeping through a knothole in an airdome fence, but he is not doing enough mischief to be deprived of his eye. Don't inflict such a terrible punishment for so small an offence, as was recently done in Brooklyn. Make the punishment fit the crime.

The Newspaper and the Needle.

The Mayor of New York City admitted that he went to picture shows and is just as fond of them as anyone else. When he was shot he did not blame the pictures for it. He put the blame where it belongs, upon the hypocrisy of yellow journals and their hypochondriac editors. A year ago the New York American was sending children into picture shows with coupons printed in that narcotic newspaper. This year they are defending childhood's innocence from the menace of the cinematograph, especially as regards boxing bouts, while at the same time doing the best they can pictorially to illustrate the various uppercuts, jabs, swings, hooks and knockouts as they occur in the day's news. Sometimes it makes us a little angry, but when morning comes we can only smile, because it is then we realize that nothing more could be expected from a paper that depends as much upon the use of the hypodermic needle as it does upon facts.—Exchange.

Can't Blame it on the Beer.

Milwaukee is not so "strong" for moving pictures as its competitor, Cincinnati, but is more so than Detroit. Cincinnati, Milwaukee's nearest competitor in population, with 360,403, is decidedly a moving picture town, with 83 places. This means that 249,000 people, or one in every 1.4 persons in the city, daily attend these shows. Detroit, with a population of 465,766, has only 39 places, which means that 1-40 of its population are devotees of the films.—Milwaukee Journal.

A FEW WORDS IN REGARD TO GAS LIGHT.

I have used most every make of gas-making outfit and find that the Ozo-Carbi outfit gives me the best satisfaction. The operator has full control of the gases at all times. There is no saturator and a tank with acetylene gas is used in place of it. This gas is very easily made by having a retort filled about half full with water, then lowering the basket with the carbide very slowly; the gas is thus made and forced into the tank. Ozo gas is made about the same as oxygen gas. You put in about three pounds of the chemicals in the retort and then heat with a gas furnace. Gas will generate in a few minutes; only be careful and don't get the retort too hot; make the gas slowly. Great care should be taken that the retort is perfectly dry and clean before filling; if this is not done the gas will not give the best results. There is no water used to wash or purify this gas, therefore it is very simple in operation.

When you are through making the gases, disconnect your retort and you are ready to start your light. Right here is where it takes an experienced man to get it just right; you must turn on a very small amount of the Ozo gas, just enough to make a slight hissing at the jet, and then hold your lighted match to the tip of the jet and turn on your Carbi gas very slowly. If you have it just right, or, in other words, the proper amount of Ozo gas, it will light up quickly and make a very bright white light very much superior to other gas outfits. If you have not enough of the Ozo gas turned on so as to force it out far enough, it will heat your jet white hot in a jiffy and is liable to burn off the tip. Should you turn on the Carbi gas first and light it, it will smoke and fill the burner with soot; therefore, you must turn on the Ozo first before lighting in order to avoid carbon deposit.

This light is somewhat cheaper than others, because the Ozo gas goes twice as far and costs no more to make and the acetylene gas is very cheap. Ten cents' worth of carbide will make enough gas for a whole evening. The jet and limes used with this outfit are the same as already described in the World.

Great care should be used in regulating the gas; don't try to use too much, it will only cool the lime and your light will not be bright. Turn your lime every four or five minutes or every two minutes if you are using a high-power jet with a large bore. If you let it pit the lime your light will be uneven. The price of this outfit is $75.00 and it is well worth the money. You can't expect to get the best results with a cheap outfit. They are made to sell to people that want cheap outfits regardless of the results they give.

THE EHIBITORS' LEAGUE MEETING AT COLUMBUS, OHIO, ON DECEMBER 5.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 22, 1910.

Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—There was a mistake made in writing you, in regard to the hotel that we would meet at. Instead of meeting at the Southern Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, we will meet at the Chittenden Hotel. I am very sorry this mistake occurred. However, I hope you will please correct it in your next issue. I assure you it will be appreciated if you will state that the meeting of December 5 will take place at the Chittenden Hotel, instead of the Southern Hotel, Columbus, Ohio.

Yours very truly,
THE EHIBITORS' LEAGUE,
By M. A. Neff, President.

A ST. LOUIS EXHIBITOR WHO BELIEVES IN GOOD MUSIC.

St. Louis, November 21, 1910.

John M. Bradlet,
160 Washington street, Chicago, Ill.

Dear Mr. Bradlet—Kindly accept my hearty appreciation for the favor and space tendered me in the Moving Picture World, November 5, 1910. You can rest assured that I will continue as before to be a strong advocate of good pictures, well arranged music, and better singing, and by all means a booster of the World.

It might be well to mention that I have signed the Harmonious Four for an indefinite period. A quartette that has made a distinct hit for the past 92 weeks at one of the largest downtown theaters here.

Thanking you again for the interest you have taken in the St. Louis picture theaters, I beg to remain,

Yours truly,
CASINO AMUSEMENT CO.,

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—In justice to the genial manager and proprietor of the Dreamland Theater, Barre, Vt. (S. Mussucco), we desire to make the following announcement through the columns of the Moving Picture World, in reply to article in November 19 issue under the heading of "Let Excelsior Be the Cue." While thanking the "Moving Picture Lover" for his kind appreciation of good things in moving picture theaters, we, being the people referred to in his article of recent date, wish to state that though we realize that in most such circumstances small salaries are the cause of so much change of help, this case was an exception, as the cause was a much-needed rest and vacation and not a matter of money. If there were more moving picture exhibitors like Mr. Mussuco, we believe the standard of the business would be raised, as he aims to have the best of everything and pay his salaries accordingly.

Again thanking "A Moving Picture Lover" for his kind appreciation of our work and wishing your paper all success, we remain, Yours truly,

MR. AND MRS. G. LESLIE PALMER,
Operator and Pianist.

THE PHOTOPLAY.

Duluth, Minn., November 10, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—In writing this I am not moved by any desire to break into your interesting columns, but simply to relieve myself of a few thoughts that boil over when I read some of the film stories in the World.

As a reporter on the daily morning paper here I handle the press notices of the changes of bills at three of Duluth's moving picture houses which I believe are among the few moving picture theaters of the country using the columns of the daily press for advertising. For the midweek changes I write only a few sticks for each theater, but for the Sunday papers when the write-ups go with our theatrical news I sometimes write a half or three-quarters of a column on some of the bills. My "stories" are based on the synopsis of the various films printed in your paper.

Now I have encountered trouble in bunches in attempting to make these picture play notes attractive and interesting and I would be more than delighted if you could offer some help through your paper. I must tell the film story, however briefly, and present reasons why it is worth seeing, but I wonder if the film makers realize that the plots of many of their little plays are nothing more than picturized versions of "Nick Carter" and "Diamond Dick" stories. This is particularly true of the Western dramas and while they may appeal to a certain class, it is not the class the best picture houses are desirous of reaching. Sometimes I have been astonished at the utter idiocy of the films on which considerable sums must have been spent to produce.

Then I wish you would tell the Biograph people to censor the preacher who writes the synopsis of their plays. Listen to this, on "Waiter No. 5".

"'For ye have the poor always with you.' (Matt. 26, 11.) Because of this we are reminded of the Corporal Works of Mercy—feed the hungry, clothe the naked, harbor the harborless—which acts always bring reward. Still there may be occasions when that reward comes tardily, but there is logical reason for the delay," etc., etc.

Right below it I notice the story of "Two Little Waifs" starts with a nine-line sermonette on the appeal of the grief of a little child. Can't the dear, good gentleman leave out the moral occasionally or at least put it at the end? Remember that is the stuff you are giving space to week after week. Then, too, the public should be given credit for ability to see a moral if there is one. If pictures of this class are made entertaining first of all, the moral will come in due time, but the picture house that deliberately attempts to preach instead of entertain will meet a deserved end.

Why is it not possible, in commenting on the films, to get hold of the public by references to the work of the actors before the camera, the difficulties encountered in bringing certain scenes into the play, the mechanical obstacles overcome, costuming and acting, instead of harping on the plots, which frequently repel rather than attract, although the film may be interesting. That is the way dramatic critics of the "legitimate" stage do and it is the personal element in the dramatic notes that makes them readable. Why, too, cannot you give weight to your film comments occasionally by sometimes calling a film bad if it is bad, instead of hunting through the haystack for a needle of doubtful brightness? I can see no reasons why the moving picture plays are not subject to the same rules of common-sense as any other plays, and the thinking public is becoming tired of the "appreciations" and is calling for the hook on a lot of film stories that are almost an insult to the popular taste.

The moving picture business has made some wonderful advances and it seems to me the time has come when more attention should be given to the publicity end. What classes are you trying to draw and how are you going to draw them?

G. DAY SMITH.

FROM AUSTRALIA.

Sydney, New South Wales, September 27, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—There is such a boom on in the moving picture business out here, that I am sometimes inclined to wonder when and where it will end. There are at the present time within a radius of fifteen miles of the general post-office in this city a no less number than eighty-three moving picture shows, open nightly to the public, and I have during the past week made it my business to take a run to very nearly all of them, and I have been not only surprised, but amazed, to see the people that were on these occasions sitting with the thermometer quite low for this part of the world, and for the season of the year, very much so, sitting with all the seeming ease of one of the city theaters and enjoying the antics of Catilino or Max Linder, or the doings of Miss Lawrence, or that winsome little soul of the A. B. Co., who has admirers out here by the thousands, and I wish that she could be induced to make a trip over to this side of the water, for I don't think she would ever get back to the United States, unless she was married when she came, for I have in my mind a very wealthy man in this city who is just breaking his heart over this young lady, and says that unless she comes over here soon that he must surely take a trip to the United States and find her out.

Since the above lines were written I am informed that another new show was opened to the public on Saturday last, and that makes the number now open to the public in Cumberland County eighty-four, and applications in for eighty-three more, so we will soon be as bad as New York and Chicago in the matter of open-air or moving picture shows, if we are not a long ways ahead. There are none of the shows open here that will not seat at the very least 1,000 to 1,200 people, and some of them will seat many thousands. There is one place in this city that is under cover, that comfortably seats 4,500 people, and then you could crowd in another 500 and a few more, and this place is outdone by "Wirth's Olympia" in Melbourne, which is much larger than that.

West's Limited are still the leaders as far as the number of people employed and the number of places open are concerned, and next to them I guess we will have to toss up as to its being Spencer's or J. D. Williams' Amusement Company, but it is safe to bet that the latter company is showing to more people daily, in this city, than any caterer for amusement of the public, and now that they are launching out so heavily and building another new theater right opposite to their present one, and going to have one on both sides of the street, it looks as if their actions would change the whole locality of the theatrical center in this city, and I myself think that it will be only a matter of a little time when they will move up more to the natural business center of the city, and that is towards the railroad depot, or head station, as they are called in English countries. The J. D. Williams Company has made some very great strides and my friend J. D. says that he will make them hustle very soon to keep pace with him, and while he is a man that talks rather large at times, and says what the Australians call "loud," he is also a man that performs, and he gets there all the time and makes good, and that is what the people like, and he could have all the capital in his business that he required if it were a million pounds, as he has the whole city talking about him, and the transformations that he has worked in the Old Oxford Theater since he took it in hand. But he did not talk much until after he got open to the public, and the place that he took had always been looked on as a perfect "Jonah" of a place, and there had been many who had sunk their dollars as quickly, almost, as if they had cast them in the sea, and when he told me what he was going to do I really felt sorry for him and told him "that he would wish that he had followed my advice and let it severely alone," but he had abiding faith in the place and the locality, and in spite of all the pessimists that met him, he was at all times very optimistic, and he said that "I need not lose any sleep over the venture, as he was not doing so, and that I would see what I would see," and I have done so, and with the Romans he can well exclaim: "Veni, vidi, vici."

Now the Australians are the greatest pirates in the world when it comes to the show business, and when they see someone come into the field they get wise and copy his methods, as well as they can from outside looks, but they don't always get on to the money-making knack that some of the Americans do when they come out to this side of the world.

There are no less than four theaters being built now for the moving picture business, in the heart of this city, and they are getting so they are almost next door to each other, and these last have all taken their ideas from American papers such as the Moving Picture World, the Film Index and The Billboard, and they will tell you that the idea and the design are purely their own.

J. D. Williams has taught them the value of plenty of electric lights in the front of the theater, and he is one of those kind of people that, when the day is dull, does not stop to think if he is going to use a few shillings' worth of current, but switches it on, and turns the darkness and the dullness into a deluge of light; and the people stop and look and wonder, and they see "the push," as they say out here, going in, and they join in the merry throng and the box office rakes in the shekels and all look happy and smiling.

Mr. C. Spencer has returned from the United States and Europe, and it is reported that he has brought over a company of artists for the taking and making of films for the trade, and that he is going to shake things up a bit. Well, we shall see, but I hope that it will not be necessary for some of us to shake them up a bit now and then, for it does some of the new rich people good to let them know that they are not the only apples on the tree, now and then.

Mr. Spencer's New Lyric Theater is nearly out of the masons' hands, and will be taken over by the finishing trades in the course of a few days, and it is going to be a very fine structure, into which the native marble will enter largely in the construction of the same. The opening will probably be on the 9th of November, but certainly by Christmas. Messrs. Pathe Freres have an office here and Mr. Crick, the manager, reports business good and that they are busy and were never more so than at the present. They have been suffering from the loss of films and condensers from a client of theirs, and his smartness led to his arrest, and he was up before the courts the other day and remanded to the higher court, and I am thinking that he will find that he will have free board and residence at the expense of the State for some little time before it is ended, and the curtain rung down on the show. Foolish man. They forget that there is in the Good Book this phrase, "Thou shalt not steal," and then they fall in and others who are dependent on them for their food and raiment have to suffer for the bread-winner's greedy haste to get rich, when he was doing a good business and making money.

125 E. 23rd Street, NEW YORK

As there are so many moving picture shows here now, it is simply impossible for me to mention them by name, but in the future I intend to take a district and write that up, and in my next letter another, and so on until I cover the whole ground.

The writer, who has been hard at work on the production of the stereoscopic effect, with one lantern and one film, has succeeded far beyond his most sanguine expectations; so much so that he is having drawings and specifications of claims made out for patents and protection in various countries of the world, and when he gets them it will simply be that a patent is but a permit or license to fight your own battles, with all the money-bags in the business falling over each other to try and beat you out of what has cost you years of labor and expense to perfect, and he has made up his mind on the course he shall pursue when his patents are allowed, or disallowed, as the case may be, but when the pictures are shown to the public with the same effect that you look at one in a good stereoscope, then the moving picture business will go ahead even faster in the public estimation than it has done in the past.

I do not say that I have got mine perfect; far from it. But I have got splendid results, and intend to have much better ones before I am many months older. Making a rough model is far from what the thing will be when made to templates and turned out with the greatest mechanical precision, and I firmly believe that I have got the ground or fundamental plans, and if the patents are allowed to me, that will give me something of a grip on some of the hogs that are in the business, that are all too ready to grab all they can lay their hands on and pay nothing for the privilege of doing so.

The chief difficulty that I have found is in the exact centering of the prisms and reflectors, so that the lines of coincidence are perfect, but "if at first you don't succeed, try, try again," and that is what I am doing in all my spare time. I will never abandon my line of work until absolutely convinced of the fact that I am wrong, but of that I know that I am not wrong. I can get the stereoscope effect all right, but the registration is not perfect, and as I use but one film, that proves to me that the fault is in the lenses either to the right or the left, and when I can get perfectly matched lenses and prisms as well as reflectors, then I will be ready to show the public an "eye-opener."

I may say that the addition of a stereoscopic set will make the machine run into very much more money than at the present time the best of them cost, but what matters that if it, like the proverbial mustard plaster, "draws"?

I have thrown out some hints in this letter, for I want to get others on the job as well as myself, as no one man can do it all, and there are none so smart but that they may profit by the experience of others. Well, I guess you have all the copy you can spare space for, and so I will close, trusting that you will think it of sufficient interest to find the space in your columns for same. Letters to the writer must be fully prepaid, or will be allowed to go to the dead-letter office, and at least 20 cents' worth of United States 2-cent postage stamps must be enclosed for a reply. DR. W. H. H. LANE.

THE APOLO THEATER, MANILA.

From the far-off Philippines comes a very appreciative letter from a World reader and a photograph of his theater. The following extract from his letter may be of interest to our readers:

"Herewith description of my theater: The house is located on the principal street of Manila; seats 470 people; performance from 4.30 until 11 P. M.; prices range from 50 cents to 20 cents (Philippine currency); my orchestra consists of nine pieces; I change twice a week and run about three thousand feet for each performance or change. At present I use nothing but Pathe films. Business is very good here. Manila has now twenty-three motion picture theaters, with only one exchange, and that is the Pathe; no American films are here as yet. I think it is a good field for a live, hustling American film exchange here. Again thanking you for your favors, I remain, "H. FRANKEL."

The Mirror Screen Has Revolutionized The Moving Picture Industry

Don't take our word for it—Read what those who know say about it.

Mr. J. Austin Fynes of Riverside Drive, New York, Pioneer Moving Picture man of America, for 15 years General Manager B. F. Keith's enterprises writes: "I regard the Mirror Screen as absolutely the most important invention that has yet come forth in our business, because it will kill present criticism of dark houses. Over here in New York, an ordinance has just been put forward, making lighted theaters a requisite for license. The Mirror Screen will comply with this regulation, and I don't know anything else that will or can."

Mr. J. A. Berst, of New York City, Vice-President Gen. Film Co. and also Vice-President of Pathe Freres, writes: "I unhesitatingly endorse the Wonderful Qualities of the Mirror Screen."

Mr. Charles A. Calehuff, of Philadelphia, Pa., the Leader Film Man, says: "I consider the Mirror Screen the MOST WONDERFUL INVENTION of the MOTION PICTURE WORLD."

Mr. Wm. E. Smith, Prop. The Bijou, Fond du Lac, Wis., says: "It has increased my business easily 25 per cent. It has done all that is claimed for it and more—it has put the picture business on a higher plane. People are visiting our theater that were never inside of a picture house before.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH.

EFFECTING A CURE. Mrs. Wilkins bid her mother-in-law come to spend the day with friends and wish them some time next day. Wilkins appreciates the time honored "Hurrah" for he is afforded an opportunity of going to the Club, indulging freely, and returning home at any old time with possibly a heavy head but a fearless heart as there will be no feminine voice calling into the outer darkness "So there you are, you drunken beast." No need to climb stairs shoeless, no danger of bumping against furniture in black dark rooms. No, its entrance shall be made in a blaze of light. Well, all transpired as he anticipated. After the session at the club, during which ardent devotes were paid to Great King Gambrinus, Wilkins is escorted home by a cabby. Sinking into a mean's chair, he falls to sleep in a jiffy. In this condition wifey and mother find him. Do they cry out and attempt to arouse him? Not much. Wifey and mamma are wise ones, so with the aid of the friends of hubby they devise a plan to cure him of his drinking. To this end they invent "the other woman," pressing into service a lady friend, who writes a note to Wilkins accepting an offer of marriage which she pretends he made her while in his cups. Of course, he is in no condition to remember where he was or what he did the night before. In truth, he wasn't outside his club. The lady also accepts an invitation she pretends he extended to take luncheon with him at two o'clock at his house. The reception of this note affects him like a dynamite bomb. Rushing to the club he asks his chums, who are of course in on the scheme, "Did I?" They reply, "You certainly did." Even the girl, whom he also seeks out keeps up her end of the trick and expresses her unalterable intention of coming to luncheon. Rushing back to the club, he exclaims: "Good heavens! I must get my wife out by two o'clock." A friend offers him two tickets for the matinee. "Ah! the very thing." He breathes easier when wifey and mother consent to go, but, curse the luck, just as they are about to get ready in come two visiting friends. "Great Scott! I must have two more." These are procured after a mad race to and from the club. All the while the hands of the clock are pushing tantalizingly towards 2 P. M. The worst comes when the visitors decline to attend the matinee, so there promises to be a warm luncheon that afternoon at the Wilkin's domicile. Two o'clock arrives, and with it the luncheon party. Wifey meets "the other woman" with pretended injured dignity. Well, the result is that Wilkins is thoroughly in earnest when he exclaims "Never again!"

A PLAIN SONG.—Edith is a salesgirl in the department store and toils most arduously to eke the lives of her decrepit mother and blind father. Quasi-poverty is their condition, as Edith's meager pittance is all there is to depend on for the existence. Sadly she compares her own loneliness with the condition of her storemates, as she views them passing by with their sweethearts, light-hearted and happy. Hence it is small wonder that she feels highly flattered and pleased at the attentions of a traveling repertoire manager who enters the store advertising his show, and presents Edith with two complimentary tickets for that evening's performance. The next day the manager appears again at the store and invites her to take a stroll with him. This is the first attention the poor girl has ever experienced, and when the manager tries to persuade her to go away with him it is a supreme struggle with inclination that prevents her leaving her old folks. The manager leaves her with ill-concealed displeasure and the next time he visits the store he tries to win her through jealousy by flirting with one of the other girls. This has the effect, and she yields to the great temptation of meeting him after store hours. With renewed endeavor he persuades her and she at last consents to go away with him, leaving a letter for her parents to the effect that she is tired of the drudgery, and longing for pleasure, has gone away. Arriving at the railroad station, where she is to meet her tempter, she sees a party of old folks on their way to the almshouse. "Remember thy father and thy mother." And she does remember, seeing them most vividly in her mind's eye. This thought so impels that she at last realizes that she is playing with fire, and turning on her heel, runs back home to find that the letter she had written is gone from the table where she left it. However, her fears are allayed when she finds the letter in possession of her blind father, who, of course, cannot read it. Taking it and tearing it to bits, she folds her dear old papa in her arms as her mother enters to share in the embrace. Her eyes opened to the falseness of the world, she is now more than ever determined to perform her sacrificial duty of caring for the old folks.

EDISON MFG. CO.

THE STOLEN CLAIM. The story deals with the love of a young doctor and the daughter of an old Professor of Mineralogy. A certain unclaimed mine has been left to the young man by his uncle. A false friend succeeds in securing the plans and records of the mine and persuades the old Professor to enter his scheme to cheat the rightful owner out of his claim. The facts are kept safely from the daughter who is in love with the real owner of the mine until some months after she has been forced to marry the false friend. The truth is then revealed to her when her former sweetheart meets her father and the "friend" in his new Western home and accuses them of deliberately stealing his claim.

But Justice takes care of its own when an explosion occurs in the mine and the father is killed and the husband is badly injured. Medical aid is required at once. The girl in a wild ride reaches the nearest village twenty miles away, and seeing the sign of a doctor on the door, she nervously knocks. It is opened she finds herself face to face with the man whom she loves and whom her husband has so cruelly wronged. She has come to ask him to save the life of his worst enemy. Here the nobility of the man is revealed. She has asked for medical aid; he is the doctor. If the man dies he may again regain the woman of his heart, but duty before everything, and he goes with her, and again, face to face, the two men meet. With the calm, quiet precision of his profession he forces his enemy to do his bidding. He saves his life and then turns to the wife. Silently the two, this man and this woman, look into each other's eyes long and earnestly and part. She sinks into her chair with a sob, a moan, realizing what she has missed in life.

For days she watches beside the bed of the man who has deprived her of happiness. Weary with watching, one night she falls asleep. He is delirious. He rises from his couch and wanders back up to the deserted mine. A moment he pauses on the edge of the dizzy height a cry from the woman startles him a shriek and he is dashed to pieces one thousand five hundred feet below.

A pale, quiet little woman dressed in black stops at the doctor's door one day and leaves a note asking for forgiveness and a mining claim upon the doctor's table, then sadly turns to leave; but a strong hand touches her shoulder, and she looks into the eyes of the man she loves, and as she stretches her arms to a great cluster of flowers on the table and holds them to her breast, we realize that something new and sweet and true has come into both their lives.

THE TOYMAKER, THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL.—There is a maker of lay-figures, a gay old party who half falls in love with his own creations of pretty women and gay soubrettes. He has a son who follows in his father's footsteps. There is a young apprentice with ambitions for the stage, who is very much in love with an orphan ward of his employer. The ward is unwillingly betrothed to the good-for-nothing son. The old man has built a wonderful soubrette figure which it is his ambition to imbue with life.

Then comes a fancy dress ball, which all the town people attend. The old man and his son dress themselves up and join the revelry. The little ward has nothing to wear and cannot go, until the apprentice suddenly conceives the brilliant idea of borrowing the clothes from the beautiful sonbrette figure and dressing his sweetheart in them. When the old toy-maker sees her at the ball, accompanied by the young man dressed as Mephistopheles, he is convinced that he sees his own creation and the Devil.

Rushing frantically from the ball, he hastens home to see if it can be true. The young people, preceding him, have no time to resume their own clothes or restore the doll to its position, so the girl takes the doll's place while the young man hides himself up the chimney. The old man and his son come in and try to induce the doll to again assume life and motion. They perform all sorts of tricks with her and the girl plays the part of the doll well enough to fool them utterly. Disgusted with their failure, they build a fire and decide to warm up a hot toddy to soothe their discouraged feelings. The young man above, smoked out by the fire, impersonates the Devil, and makes the doll live and dance for the old man on condition that he consent to the marriage of his ward to his apprentice. The old man and his son quarrel over this agreement, and after the girl has put the clothes back upon the doll the son returns and smashes it to atoms to get square with his father.

In the evening the old man is called upon by his apprentice, who demands the hand of his ward in marriage. When the old man refuses the document, signed by himself, is flashed before him, and then the young man confesses the trick that he had played. He tells the old man that he impersonated the Devil and (not knowing that the son is listening behind him) tells him that the girl, the ward, impersonated the doll. The son is horrified at the thought of having killed the girl he once loved, but the apprentice, understanding the situation more thoroughly, calls the girl from her own room and the young man apparently sees a miracle—the doll-girl, which he had smashed, restored to life! In his joy at his escape from murder he gladly relinquishes all claim to the hand of the ward, and insists upon his father making good his written word.

HIS MOTHER'S THANKSGIVING.—We are first introduced to an old-fashioned New England kitchen and dining-room combined, where a few simple country folks have gathered to give their thanks to God for all the blessings that have been bestowed upon them. Our interest is centered mostly around the mother of the household and her son, who are plain, simple New England folks. The son soon longs for a broader field for his ambition than the country village can give, and so, one day, starts for the city.

Many years glide by and the simple farm boy has grown to manhood, and success has reached him from every side, while away back in New England we see that the little mother is just the same a little older, a little grayer. A certain restless anxiety is in her movements as she takes a big old-fashioned pie from the oven. It is for her boy. He is coming home to spend Thanksgiving with her for the first time in ten years.

A knock is heard at the door and the rural postmaster hands the dear old lady a letter. It is from her son. She tears open the letter. The smile fades from her lips. A clock drops from the letter unheeded, for in that letter is a heartache—her boy is not coming home on Thanksgiving Day. As she takes up picture from the worn old album and looks at it sadly part of the room fades, and we see the boy and the other woman, who loves him too. A moment of suspense—eyes that look into eyes—a catch of the breath, and as he clasps his sweetheart in his arms and presses the first long kiss of love upon her lips, we see the dear old mother sadly kissing the picture of her boy.

New England is a long way from the great city where her boy lives, but she decides to go to him on Thanksgiving Day and surprise him. As she enters his house she does not know that a Thanksgiving dinner party is to be held, that her boy's sweetheart will be there in all her grandeur, that each guest will be dressed in the height of fashion. She does not realize that her old, worn-out clothes of the country will be out of place in these surroundings. She only knows that she is going to see her boy; but the sad awakening comes when she finds herself upstairs in a neatly furnished room and the butler placing a tray of food before her. Her boy is ashamed of her, and she is to eat her Thanksgiving dinner alone. What would his sweetheart, a lady of fashion, think of her, his mother, if she saw her in this old-fashioned attire? What? Wait and you shall see.

A knock at the door—a fair young girl enters—a rustle of silk and satins. "Ah, I beg your pardon, but I thought this is where the butler said I was to remove my cloak." She sees a huge, old-fashioned pie on the dresser, a note beside it, and the words "my boy" and "your mother" catch her eye. There is a cry of joy, and the dear old lady is locked close in soft young arms. That's what she thinks of his mother. She is his mother; that's all she cares to know. Amid sobs and smiles the girl learns the truth, and one can imagine the shame upon the boy's face when he enters the room a few moments later and finds mother and sweetheart gaily eating their Thanksgiving dinner together. Soon all is forgiven and forgotten, and this sweet, simple story closes with the dear old lady saying thanksgiving at the head of her son's table.

HANK AND LANK.—Hank and Lank have inside information that it's meal time, but it looks as if they would have to skip a meal or two until Hank's fertile brain maps out a royal road to a big feed. Into the "Ragout Restaurant" goes Hank, and soon returns wearing a pair of large signboards proclaiming the goodness of the bill of fare at the eating house. Hank is rewarded by a fine feed, for he has managed to steer a large crowd to the restaurant.

Now it's Lank's turn. He has seen how easily Hank earned the big eats, and loses no time in applying to the "Apax" restaurant. They have seen that the rival house has increased its patronage by advertising, and Lank soon is at large upon the community with a pair of boards upon which the name "Apax" appears in large letters.

But carrying the heavy sandwich is strenuous work, and Lank stops frequently to rest. While loafing on a corner two boys, intent upon mischief, fix upon him as a likely victim. A painter happens along at this moment, and they appropriate his paint and brushes. Stealing up behind the unsuspecting Lank, they quickly obliterate the letter "X" from his sign. Lank innocently strolls away, followed by Hank, who has come upon the scene in time to see the fun.

Lank's wanderings lead him to an alley where a gang of Irish laborers are eating their noonday lunch. Lank thinks that this is an auspicious place to display the restaurant ad, and walks boldly by. However, these loyal sons of Erin do not welcome an invitation to eat at the "A. P. A." restaurant. A box of newly mixed mortar is convenient for their purposes, and Lank is treated to a most "mortarfying" bath in the plastic material.

THAT POPULAR TUNE. Blinks goes to the theater, where he hears it first. Mlle. Tince sings it, is repeatedly encored and continues to sing it until Blinks leaves the theater in disgust.

Blinks enters a restaurant, orders a big meal and is about to eat heartily when the orchestra merrily strikes up the latest rag, "Twinkling Eyes." Blinks upsets his table and after dousing the musicians and everyone else with a cold spray from the seltzer bottle angrily leaves the restaurant.

Blinks goes to his office and finds his stenographer pounding the piano and Jimmy, the office boy, playing it on a mouth organ. Blinks destroys both the stenographer and the mouth organ and in disgust leaves the office.

He enters a barber shop and in the midst of a shave when the colored barber whistles a gaily warbled Rock-a-bye Baby tune and upsetting the surprised darkey dashes out of the door.

Blinks goes home but is again upset when his neighbors in the flat below begin singing and playing "Twinkling Eyes." Blinks goes down and insists on their cutting out the music. For his pains Blinks is thrown out of the window and alights at the feet of an Italian organ grinder, who is also playing the new air.

Night comes and Blinks goes to bed but the little German band comes serenading him with their every selection "Twinkling Eyes." Blinks hurls a pitcher of water at the musicians then returns to bed. But in his dreams he relives the scenes of the day while the melody of that popular tune continues to ring in his ears.

Blinks awakens and gives up hope, while his rolling eyes and the painful droop of his mouth indicate that he is another candidate for the dippy house.

THE FLAT NEXT DOOR. At a family hotel the rooms of Mr. Young Man and Old Boy are separated by the apartments of a young and pretty widow, who is fortunate enough to be loved by both of them. Mr. Young Man with youthful impetuosity is the first to make a declaration of love and is accepted. Mr. Old Boy who is now treated coldly when he presents himself is so grieved that he decides to commit suicide. After having found the barrel of a revolver too cold to bring about a really pleasant death he hits upon the idea of hanging himself and immediately lays plans for his "taking off." When the crucial moment arrives he finds inventive genius is indeed powerless against the pranks of fate, for when he makes the drop which was to prove fatal the hangman's rope severs and the force of his fall carries him through the floor of his room into the widow's drawing-room. It happens that at the same time two robbers are in the room and the sight of Mr. Old Boy entering through the ceiling so fairly frightens them that they make a rapid exit. Mr. Young Man, who is in the drawing-room when the robbers enter, becomes so frightened that he flees, leaving the widow to the tender mercies of the rogues. The lady now pays her obligations to Mr. Old Boy by rejecting the young man and taking her rescuer in his stead.

TARASCON ON THE RHONE.—We are first shown the bridge spanning the Rhone between the cities of Tarascon and Beaucaire (France), after which we are taken on a short trip up the river to the old castle which was begun by Count Louis the Second in the fourteenth century and finished by King Rene of Anjou in the fifteenth century. The old turret stair and chapel entrance are charming examples of fifteenth century architecture. The castle is now used as a prison, and it is but a few moments' walk from this famous old building to the quaint market and town hall which we next visit. After enjoying the various activities of the natives at this place of barter we are next shown the statue in memory of the town's deliverance from a dragon. La Tarasque, a legendary monster which threatened the town in the early part of the fourteenth century. Our little journey is shortly brought to a close by a little tour to the Villa Tartarn and the castle of Beaucaire, which we view by the rays of the setting sun.

THE RETURN AT MIDNIGHT.—A Frenchman of mature years loves a gypsy girl, and he is therefore very nonplussed when his father introduces a young lady whom he has arranged with the girl's father that his son shall marry. The old people are greatly upset when the man refuses the proposed match, and his father on seeing him in company with the gypsy, sends him from his home. The men marries the woman of his choice, though the alliance is not a very prosperous one, for we see them two years later tramping along the road near the man's home, and evidently in the last stage of destitution. The wife goes to the house of her husband's father and they give her food. Left alone to sleep by the kitchen fire, she admits her husband. The old man, hearing the two, goes down, thinking the woman is the decoy of thieves. He is about to fire at the stranger when his daughter-in-law rushes forward and knocks up the gun. The father takes pity on the pair, and overlooks his son's disobedience.

A TRIP THROUGH CEYLON.—That island in the Indian Ocean separated on the northwest from continental India by the Gulf of Mannar, is one of the best known localities in the world so far as the name alone is concerned, and perhaps one of the least well-known as far as actual knowledge goes. The island with its about 24[illegible] miles in length and one hundred and [illegible] miles in width provides a trusted field for the camera and ours has been decidedly successful in obtaining some of the most characteristic views of the island and its people. The [illegible] that makes [illegible] scenes very vivid and real. Natives are [illegible] grasped at their ordinary occupations as we come on water carriers, quaint native carts, and men with huge leaves over their heads to keep off the sun's fierce rays as they work. There is no end of novelty about the proceedings to interest the [illegible] of work. They are seen dressing and pushing huge logs and then the day's labor over the scramble with extraordinary agility, transporting their great bulk down a steep slope into the river. Here they roll in the mud and spatter water through their trunks to the discomfort of the lookers, who must not leave them.

THE TOUCH OF A CHILD'S HAND. A [illegible] is drawn between Mr. Livingston, a wealthy widower, and his little son Billie, and Dan Newton, a workingman and little Jimmie, his son. Each boy is idolized by his father. It so happens that little Jimmie is accidentally run down and killed by Mr. Livingston's automobile. Mr. Livingston does all that a gentleman could do to comfort the grief-stricken father and to make reparation, but Newton, crazed by his loss, his bereavement following a long period of hard luck, completely upsets his reason and in his ravings he comes to the conclusion that the loss of his little son can only be balanced by the death of Mr. Livingston's little boy. And with this idea in mind Newton gains entrance into the Livingston house at night and makes his way to the little boy's bedroom. He kneels by the child's crib, is about to plunge a knife into the heart of the sleeping child, when the boy, stirring uneasily, lifts his little hand and places it gently on the cheek of the would-be assassin. The touch of the child's hand is sufficient to restore the father to his reason, and realizing the enormity of the deed he had contemplated, he breaks into tears and is thus found by Mr. Livingston.

ELDER ALDEN'S INDIAN WARD.—During the period when the Puritans were in many parts of the country friendly with the Indians it is well known a number of the prominent chiefs were frequent callers at the homes of the whites and were often on terms of confidence. Elder Alden was a Puritan of a stern religious frame of mind who had entered into such friendly relations with Chief Squantum, a noted Pequot Indian, and Chief Squantum, to show his faith in Elder Alden, brought to the Puritan his little son to be brought us as a white man. Elder Alden took in the little Indian boy and brought him up as one of his own, and when the lad reached young manhood his Indian blood asserted itself and he not only refused to work, but in addition demanded the young daughter of Elder Alden as his squaw. Enraged at being refused, he left the Alden home and went back to his tribe, there becoming a thoroughly bad Indian and a leader in uprisings against the whites. His final act of treachery was to head a foray against the little settlement in which the Alden home was located. The aged Chief Squantum, learning of the proposed raid, traveled many weary miles to give the settlers warning, but he was too late, and the painted redskins headed by his own son burst into the Alden home just as the old chief was warning them to prepare their defense, and when thus confronted by the treachery of his son the old chief drew his knife and in defending the young girl killed his own son.

SHADOWS AND SUNSHINE.—The clerk grown grey in the faithful service of a single employer, arrives one morning to find the young nephew of his boss occupying the desk he himself has had so long. Brutally he is told that he is too old to perform his duties properly and is ordered away. At first his stunned brain is unable to comprehend the situation but gradually he comes to realize that he is being dismissed and frantically he pleads for a chance to make a living, pointing out that with the small wage paid him he has been unable to save anything and in a frenzy seeks to take his chair by force from the younger man. But he is driven from the office and in a daze he makes his slow progress homeward to tell the faithful wife that he has been dismissed. Here, at least, he finds sympathy, but it is the sympathy of a common sorrow, for she, too, realizes that they have been plunged into the shadows of poverty. Bravely the old man goes out to look for work but none have use for him and sometimes churlishly, sometimes with pity he is told there is nothing for him. One or two offer charity but this is refused. He cannot bring himself to take alms. And when the shadows seem the blackest a solution of the problem seems to suggest itself. He cannot longer support his wife. Their scanty store of money will last longer if there is only one to spend it and all will be kinder to the widowed woman. His foot has caught in a length of rope and with this in his hand he seeks the seclusion of a deserted building. Throwing the rope around a beam and climbing upon an old box he murmurs

PALS. Denton, a young Easterner, arrives in the gold-fields, looks about for a "find" and a partner. Entering a saloon, he partakes of some refreshment, watches the patrons of the place and studies their characters. While thus engaged a young miner, named Harper, somewhat prejudiced against Easterners, engages in a quarrel with a Mexican who is about to plunge a knife into the miner when Denton seizes his wrist and wrenches the weapon from his grasp.

Harper thanks Denton, and after learning the Eastern man's desire to find a prospecting partner, Denton joins forces with him and they start in to work a lead and strike paying dirt.

They have hardly started operations when Denton meets with a serious accident and again Harper shows the manner of man he is by nursing his pal back to health and strength. This brings about a strong friendship and they go to work with a will and it is not long before they strike it rich. Weighing up their gold-dust they find they have a handsome pile and are now on easy street.

Harper goes out to work and has proceeded but a short distance when he is seen by the treacherous Mexican who stealthily watches him on his way and then makes tracks for the pals' shack.

Just after Harper leaves the shack Denton receives a telegram from his wife telling him that his mother is sick and advising him to return home at once. He leaves a letter for Harper with the despatch stating that he will leave the gold-dust intact as he has sufficient cash and the message will explain the cause of his hasty departure.

The Mexican can be seen peering through the window watching Denton and the hiding of the dust in the chimney. Denton then hastily exits and hurries for the train. The villainous greaser enters the cabin, steals the gold and destroys the letter and telegram and replaces them with a note saying Denton had gotten tired and skipped.

When Harper returns and finds the note he is furious, tells the sheriff and follows Denton East. Arriving at Denton's home town he traces him through an accident to a little child who happens to be Denton's own daughter. He carries the child home and the next day calls to see the little girl and while he is sitting by her bedside Denton comes in. It is a dramatic situation, but after explanations and the recognition at that moment of a "mate" from the sheriff in the gold-field announcing the confession of the Mexican, all is understood and once more the two men become pals and renew their bond of friendship.

PATHE FRERES.

A BORDER TALE.—A band of smugglers are waiting at a tavern in a wild part of Bohemia for evening in order to carry some goods across the frontier. The entrance of Hansel, a customs officer, does not disturb them, as they know that he is in love with Malvina, the innkeeper's daughter. Presently the chief of the band enters accompanied by Zingara, a gypsy dancing girl, who is also one of the band. She offers to tell fortunes. The cards are shuffled and Malvina cuts a heart, for love, and a spade, the sign of death. Malvina looks scared, but Zingara's light laugh as she scatters the cards brings back a smile. The others leave, and Zingara is about to do so, when she sees a messenger hand a note to Hansel. She and the chief watch, and learn the instructions to the other to lie in wait for the smugglers that night. Zingara is forced by the orders and threats of the chief to divert the danger by luring Hansel into their power. This she does, but afterwards releases him at the cost of her life, for in endeavoring to shield him from the pistol of the chief her own heart is penetrated by a bullet. So the evil omen of the cards comes true, although it is poor Zingara who pays forfeit. Her brave act, however, affords Hansel means to collect his men in time to intercept and overpower the smugglers, and Zingara's death is avenged by that of the chief at the hands of Hansel himself.

THE TALE THE MIRROR TOLD.—Louisa Gerrin, a widow with a little boy of six years, is endeavoring to struggle her way through life. Her landlord refuses her any extra time for payment of her rent, and with a heavy heart she sends little Jack to school and goes to her own work as a sewing woman at the house of a well-to-do maiden lady. She keeps wondering what she will have to do now, that it looks as if she will be ejected from her lodging. It is hard for her to work, and her eyes wander aimlessly around the room. They rest upon a well-filled purse on the sideboard. She is tempted and she tries to dismiss the thought of stealing by applying herself more assiduously to her work. She cannot, however, resist. No one would know that she took it—there are other servants in the house—and Louisa rises from her chair to advance to the sideboard, then struggles with temptation, to retreat again to her chair. The mistress has at this time just sat down in her chair in the adjoining room to read her paper. She reads about a lady who was murdered by her servant for her purse. Instinctively she feels for her own, and remembers where she left it. She rises to fetch it, but in the mirror sees Louisa take it from the sideboard. Louisa has scarcely reseated herself before she is assailed with remorse. Her better self asserts itself, and not knowing that her mistress is watching her she replaces the purse. The old lady enter and finds the landlord's letter on the table, which she reads behind Louisa's back. A few seconds later little Jack comes in from school proudly wearing a medal presented to him for diligence. The old lady, compassionate for his mother, whom in the goodness of her heart she now desires to aid as delicately as possible, hands him four gold coins under the pretext of wishing to give him an additional reward.

WHAT A DINNER!—Dr. Chimp is decidedly eccentric and apparently rather likes to chew his way through a good dinner before retiring to rest. It is probably the excellence of this last meal that is responsible for the weird nightmare that assails him during his sleep. Certain it is that curious things befall him, as, for instance, the finding of himself in the kitchen of an old woman decidedly witch-like in appearance. Strange animals, shadowy in outline, but large in bulk, spring into existence at the instant command of the witch's black cat, and disappear with equal suddenness. Then the old woman sends her visitor flying before her broom, and he finds himself in his bed again. Imaginary struggles with elusive burglars and a clumsy nondescript-looking official end the night, and in the gray morning the doctor awakes to find himself desperately fighting the bed clothes.

THE MAID OF NIAGARA.—The film opens with love scenes between Esoomgit, a young warrior of the Iroquois tribe, and Red Doe, a chief's daughter, and one of the most beautiful of the Iroquois tribe. They return to the great camp, and Esoomgit seeks out her father, but he refuses his consent to her marriage with Esoomgit, stating that only a chief should marry his daughter. Great rivalry existed between the Iroquois and the Bison Indians, so when at a meeting of the two tribes Esoomgit excels himself by winning not only the marksmanship competition, but also the riding and swimming contests, it is only natural that he should be proclaimed a chief, and his marriage to Red Doe sanctioned by her father. It was now time for the annual sacrifice to propitiate the Sprit of the Cataract. This ceremony consisted in the selection by lot of one of the most beautiful daughters of the Iroquois and placing her in a canoe to float to death over the falls. The maidens take their seats in a circle. An arrow is shot high in the air. It falls at the feet of Red Doe. Esoomgit is horrified. His bride-to-be is the one selected for the sacrifice. He tries to dissuade her. Her strong sense of honor and duty to her tribe, however, prevails. She enters her canoe and paddles out from the shore. The swift current carries her along. She approaches the great Falls of Niagara. She is soon on the brink and then goes over the edge, engulfed in the great mass of water, to be ultimately washed upon the rocks below a lifeless corpse. Esoomgit follows down the banks of the river disconsolate. He finally reaches her dead body. His life is spoiled. He wades out in the raging torrent and is quickly sucked under, but he knows he will meet his love in the Happy Hunting Grounds.

THE QUEEN OF HEARTS.—A romance of two worlds, having its inception in the banking house of Conklin. Cashier Black refuses to consider a loan on farmer Allen's farm for $5,000.00.

Dick Harmon, the sweetheart of May Allen, the oldest daughter, is unfortunately poor—poor in purse, but rich in manhood, and this is the one reason he does not meet with favor with Cashier Black, who also has turned the father's mind against Dick. Dick decides to go to the gold fields and endeavor to seek his fortune there with hopes that some day he may return and claim the farmer's daughter.

The bank cashier, seeing the reverse fortunes of farmer Allen, sees an opportunity to wend his way into the affections of the daughter by proffering financial assistance, and accordingly calls at the home and is introduced to May and at once presses his suit—takes a personal mortgage on the farm and shows many personal courtesies to Allen.

In the meantime Dick has not found pan-washing a profitable venture and writes May discouragingly of his prospects. All serves to further Black's hold on the friendship of May, and the wedding day is set, the honeymoon begun; almost at the same moment a second message is received from Dick telling of his good fortune and referring to her coming marriage with Black, asks her to wait his arrival. However, she was unfortunately already on her way to Europe.

Dick arrives at the old home only to find that he is too late. Later we find Black and his wife seated in their villa at Monte Carlo—their experiences in far-away Italy were not at all pleasing and many times May's mind would wander back to the little farm and her girlhood friend, Dick.

A quick succession of events transpires rapidly and we find the mortgage is bought up by Dick and what appeared as an accident resulted in the death of Black. Then the return to America of May and her reuniting to her first love.

THE STEPMOTHER.—A happy brother and sister awaiting some news from their father who had gone to the city for a visit. In time a letter came that cast gloom over the happy little farm home, saying he had a great surprise for them—that he had met a lovely woman and they were now the proud possessors of a stepmother. They are instructed to meet them at the station Nellie remaining at home to prepare for the newcomer, while Joe goes to the station. Upon their arrival home the new head of the family is installed with no small amount of misgivings upon the part of Nellie and Joe.

Trouble is soon brewing and the first family row occurs. Tom, Nellie's sweetheart, calls on her and the stepmother, taking a liking to him, orders Nellie away. A handbill announcing a farmers' dance is circulated, so all decide to attend the festivities. The next day the stepmother drives to town to buy clothes for the picnic and on the way inadvertently comes upon Tom walking in for the same purpose; he is invited to ride with her. The scene then reverts to the farm, where father and son are cutting wood and Nellie is doing the washing.

The trading done in town, the stepmother and Tom start on their return; when near the home Tom is left behind, a diplomatic move of the farmer's wife. Upon her arrival the usual greeting to the husband is missing and he is plainly perplexed. The day of the festivities arrives and everyone for miles around is there; the stepmother leaves the gathering for a walk and Tom shortly follows unnoticed. As the collection hat is being passed the farmer notices his wife's handbag and being without change to contribute, opens the purse and to his surprise finds a letter addressed to him; upon opening it he is astonished to find it from his supposed wife's real husband:

> John Bentley:
> Dear Sir—The woman you have married is an adventuress. She is only after your money. She is my wife, but deserted me two months ago and I have but now learned of her whereabouts. The enclosed photo of her will prove to you that I am not mistaken.
> Sincerely yours,
> EMMETT BROWN.

The father, son and daughter go in search and find her and Tom in fond embrace and he is convinced that the woman is not what he had so fondly imagined her to be. Upon their return to the farm she is sent away and the little family is again back at its starting point. John Bentley, his son and daughter are again happy.

SUSPICION.—Mrs. Hall's little child dies and she grieves herself into an almost complete breakdown. Her husband and her doctor advise her to desist.

In order to satisfy the longings of her nature and seek consolation she interests herself in an orphanage, where she goes every day, unknown to her husband, to care for and help the little ones. She sews for them, loves to assist them in their play and she places a memorial tablet in the playroom of the home in memory of her daughter.

Mr. Hall notices that his wife goes out every day, and that she is hiding something from him. He becomes suspicious and engages a detective to watch her. The detective follows her to the children's home, sees her enter the place with a gentleman, and reports to Mr. Hall.

The husband goes to the orphanage with the detective. They gain entrance to the building and hear the wife talking in one of the rooms. They rush in and find Mrs. Hall surrounded by the little ones. The husband is nonplussed and abashed. The gentleman who was seen entering the institution with Mrs. Hall comes into the room, hand Mrs. Hall his card, "Albert H. Houston, Superintendent of Bethany Home." Mr. Hall now feels heartily ashamed of his suspicion, and completely overcome when his wife leads him to the tablet and he reads:

> THE PLAY ROOM, BETHANY ORPHAN ASYLUM.
> The Gift of Mrs. A. J. Hall
> In memory of her daughter Helen, who died September 1st, 1910,
> Aged eight years.

The children, superintendent and the detective leave the room. Left to themselves, Mrs. Hall places her hand tenderly on his shoulder, and he sorrowfully asks her forgiveness for his unjust and unkind suspicions.

A FOUR-FOOTED PEST.—"The horse has four legs, one in each corner." This is a four-footed horse, one of man's most faithful friends, excepting an automobile, which is not a horse. Well, this horse is called a pest, which is a peculiar kind of animal, because he is only a mischievous horse that knows and does a whole lot of things that make a whole lot of fun that keeps his victims busy and the rest of us laughing.

He runs away, dumps his driver into a mudpuddle, unties a woman's clothesline, letting the clothes fall in the dirt. He is chased by the woman and an ever-increasing crowd. He runs to the seashore, makes off with the wraps of the bathers, and they join in the chase and add to the fun and excitement. The next thing this pesky horse does is to pull a newspaper out of a man's hand while the man is seated on a bench in the park, next to an old lady, to whom the horse turns his attention and eats the flowers from her bonnet, pulls it off, and the old lady's wig with it. The man and woman start in pursuit. Then he puts his head in a kitchen window, eats up a freshly cooked pie, and goes away with it, followed by the cooks.

A party of children playing on the lawn see the mischievous animal, and try to drive him away. The horse seizes the hose, turns on the water and gives the youngsters a ducking. The chase is a merry one, but our four-footed friend outdistances all hands, reaching his stable, where he awaits their coming, and when they arrive gives them all a laugh and an encore of "Ha! ha! ha!" which the onlookers enjoy and re-echo with peals and roars of merriment.

WHAT IS TO BE, WILL BE.—The household of Dr. ——— in a small Massachusetts village, have been in mourning at the departure of Jack Marion, who is going on a long cruise. Conspicuous among the absentees is Molly Newell, the village beauty, and as the dance progresses it requires no seer to discover that Jack is madly in love with Molly and that the attractions are by no means one-sided. Stanley Wells, the local fellow tries to escort Molly home, but she has already promised Jack and the two girls leave with the boys and girls large at Stanley. On their way home Jack gives Molly a photograph of himself and they plight their troth.

At the quay the next day Molly takes leave of her lover and sorrowingly waves him a fond good-bye.

For several months no news of the "Marion II," upon which Jack has sailed, is heard, but at last sad tidings of the complete loss of the good old ship comes to the village. Stanley tries to keep the truth from Molly, but she suspects the worst, hears the notice of the disaster and is struck dumb with sorrow.

Things go badly at Molly's home, and finally she, her father and mother are reduced to the point of starvation. Stanley, becoming aware of their poverty, offers to marry Molly and gladly take care of her folks. She gently refuses, saying that her heart is buried beneath the sea with her sailor lover. Despite this Stanley is willing to take her; and urged by her mother, Molly finally accepts.

After a lapse of two years we find Molly the doting mother of a handsome boy, whom she loves devotedly. She, however, cannot forget her old sweetheart; and she sits by the cradle of her little one, and a vision opens to her: she sees herself and Jack as they wandered through the shady lanes some years ago. Her happy smile suddenly changes to horror as the vision is replaced by the dead figure of her old lover, washed ashore on the rocks. This gradually fades until the cry of "Molly!" causes her to turn around and she beholds Jack standing in the doorway, with outstretched arms. Thinking it a part of the vision, Molly draws away, but as Jack advances, she touches him and finds that he is real flesh and blood. Unconsciously she falls into his arms, but on remembering that she is the wife of another, she struggles to free herself.

Jack's gaze falls on the baby and he realizes the situation. He upbraids her, but she quickly explains the circumstances and he forgives her. Though tempted to fly with each other, Jack's nobility of soul and Molly's sense of duty to her child cause them to part. Jack departs, never to return, and Molly is saved to herself, her husband and her boy.

POWERS PICTURE PLAYS.

THE WOMAN HATER.—Carrol Morten, a young society man, disappointed in love, becomes a woman hater. To get away from women he visits the ranch of an old friend, "Pop" Larned. Enter "Pop's" pretty niece also for an unexpected visit. Morten snubs the girl, who has fallen in love with him. While out riding Morten is captured by some bad Indians and in the struggle to save his life Morten kills one of the Indians. The band carry Morten off to torture him by fire. The girl sees the Indians capture Morten and after a thrilling ride pursued by an Indian, the girl reaches the ranch house and tells of Morten's plight. The brave girl leads eight white men to where Morten, bound to a tree, is about to be burned to death. The white men arrive just in time and with a few well-directed shots, drive off the Indians and rescue Morten. In the last scene the woman hater realizes that all girls are not alike, and he breaks his vow.

WHO WINS THE WIDOW.—The widow has two rival suitors for her hand, Jim and Bill. The two men quarrel and old man Simms, a friend of Bill's, desires to prevent bloodshed. He gets the men to fight a duel with pistols loaded with blank cartridges, which fact is unknown to Jim. The men fire and Bill pretends to fall dead. The widow now accepts Bill out of sympatay for his supposed wounds. They are about to be married when Jim arrives. Imagine the situation when he sees the man he left for dead being married to the woman he loves. Jim finally wins the widow when she learns the truth.

WANTED: A BABY.—Harold foolishly tells his rich uncle from whom he expects to inherit some money that he has a fine son. The old man announces that he is coming to visit Harold and see the baby. Harold instructs his wife to borrow or steal a baby. The old man arrives just as the borrowed baby is brought in. Horrors! It proves to be a coon baby. Hardly have the young couple straightened out this scrap when the second baby comes in and all is smooth until Mr. O'Reilly, father of the child, comes in and demands it.

YANKEE

QUEEN OF THE NIHILISTS.—Vladimar Petroff, leader of the revolutionists in Russia, was brought before the Governor-General charged with treason. His two little children, Sophia and Carl, aged six and seven, come to beg for clemency for their father. The Governor-General, a cold, heartless man who sees danger in allowing the revolutionary element the slightest chance of attaining power, and being personally embittered against the prisoner, orders him put to the knout before the eyes of his children.

The agony of the father is apparent to the little ones who try to comfort him, but withering in pain as he tells them to keep these in their minds the scene they have just witnessed and when they grow up to manhood and womanhood to find a means of avenging his death.

Eighteen years later we find Sophia and Carl in the secret stronghold of the Nihilists. Carl is their leader and Sophia their queen. To carry out their plans against the Government, a spy was sent to the palace of the Governor-General to obtain information vital to their cause. Osip was selected for the dangerous mission. Arriving at the palace, he adroitly concealed himself behind a huge portrait, where he could obtain a full view of all that transpired. The Governor-General, while consulting with one of his secret aides, happened to glance in a small mirror on his desk and there saw reflected a face. It was Osip. Quietly a note was written and handed to the aide, who read it without a word and left the room. Almost immediately the guards brought Osip before the Governor-General. Yivan, the aide, looked him over carefully and whispered a plan to his chief. Osip was led away and Yivan began the execution of his plan. Disguised as the Nihilist, the aide made his way to their stronghold, where he was received with open arms by all but Sophia, who, becoming suspicious, decided to put his identity to the test. In an outer chamber a body of men were dressed to represent Russian soldiers and they, following a supposed officer, burst in upon the Nihilist group and ordered them to surrender. The Governor's spy revealed his identity, but found too late he had fallen into the trap laid for him by Sophia. Firing three shots from his pistol, a pre-arranged signal for help, he summoned a detachment of soldiers and the rattle of musketry filled the room, while Russian and Nihilist fought for supremacy. When the smoke cleared away they found Sophia missing. She had escaped by a secret passageway into an underground tunnel. The rest of her followers were taken prisoners and forthwith sentenced to Siberia for life, among them Sophia's brother.

Joining a band of gypsies, the brave girl disguised herself as a dancer and managed to gain admittance to the Governor-General's palace, where, luckily, she found him in the midst of a debauch. Signifying her willingness to dance for him, Sophia managed to dazzle the wine-crazed ruler by her charms, although he was suspicious of her and feared she might be the Nihilist queen.

Ordering Carl brought in, the Governor-General watched Sophia closely while the guards flogged him before her eyes. She retained her composure and only laughed as Carl was lashed. Satisfied with the test, the Governor-General ordered the guards away with their prisoner and poured wine for himself and the girl. Sophia managed to place a drug in the now contented ruler's glass, and finally effected Carl's release.

They mounted waiting horses and rode for the frontier, passing through the lines in safety and finally embarking on a vessel bound for America.

Arriving at the harbor of New York, Sophia and Carl received their first impression of the land of the free. Silhouetted against the sky, the Statue of Liberty stood out in bold relief, a sign of freedom of oppression for the unfortunate soul-tortured emigrant.

A year later we find them happy in their home, celebrating an American Fourth of July.

IN THE CZAR'S NAME.—A young Russian noble, Ivan Baranoff, falls in love with a Jewish maiden of the city, Olga by name. The girl's father, a straight-laced, yet refined Jewish Rabbi, is incensed at the thought of a union between Olga and the son of a cruel Russian ruler and forbids her seeing him again. A stormy scene ensues and the angry father whips the girl for her disobedience. Smarting under the sting of his blows, she writes a note declaring her intentions and leaves to join her lover.

Ivan and Olga go hand in hand to the great Church of St. Petersburg where the girl renounces her Jewish faith and becomes a Christian. Her father, mother and brother seek admittance to the church, hoping to prevent the ceremony, but are set upon by Russian peasants and only saved from violence at their hands by the timely arrival of Olga and the Priest.

An over-zealous peasant reports to the Russian Prefect of Police that the old Rabbi was inciting riot and endeavoring to start a movement against the government. Being a rank Jew-hater, Metchinoff sees a chance to vent his ire against the hated race and sends the peasant, well supplied with gold, to the drinking places with instructions to buy wine for everyone who will drink and then to encourage a wholesale slaughter of Jews. The peasants, headed by their leader, rush to the Tabernacle while the Jews are observing "Yom Kippur" or the Day of Atonement, and while in the midst of their religious ceremony, the maddened peasants fire the edifice and kill many of their number. The Moscovitch family are miraculously saved from death only to be taken prisoners and brought before the Prefect who consigned them to a worse fate Siberia. Ivan intercedes, but with no success and the little band of sufferers are led away to await the long march over the ice fields to a living death.

Olga and Ivan plan to effect their escape. He follows the guard, appointed by the Prefect to escort the prisoners on their journey, and manages to fill him with wine whereupon he takes his official papers and letters, disguises himself as a guard and hastes off to the prison where he finds Olga in the guise of a Sister of Mercy, supposedly ministering to the wants of the prisoners. They manage to effect the escape of the Jews and Olga's parents reluctantly offer their forgiveness together with their thanks.

Ivan books passage to America for the entire party and they leave Russian soil never to return. They arrive in New York and are cared for by relatives. Later on, happy and prosperous, they visit Washington, the nation's capital, where President Taft receives them.

NOTHING BUT MONEY.—The fisherman was a gabby, egotistical Open Dilldock sort of an old chap, who took particular delight in boring his acquaintances with his tales of valor, but all he had to show for his greatness was a shabby suit and a long beard. On his way to the pier, he boasted of the fish he would bring back. On the pier he fell asleep and dreamed a dream full of wonderful happenings. In his subconscious state he got a bite and landed a coffee pot wadded with money. Then things began to happen. He hurried uptown and bought a loud suit and high hat from a second-hand dealer, flooring the son of Israel with an over-dose of pay.

Moved by a spirit of philanthropy, he rode down the street on a mule, led by a policeman, followed by another officer, bearing a sign inscribed "The Money King." He purchased the entire stock of a flock of newsboys and stuffed the hat of a blind man with money, causing instantaneous recovery of sight. He bought out a candy store to satisfy the longing of a couple of sweet-toothed urchins. He settled an argument between two gamblers by destroying the money they were quarreling over and replacing it by a large amount of his own.

Feeling paternal, he took a pair of infant twins for an outing. Attracted by the sylph-like form of a lady in the park, he flirted and was encouraged. A close inspection showed the lady to be a negress, and the fisherman fled in alarm. Then began a fast roaring finish. In his flight he knocked over a couple of drunkards and rushed into a group of cripples in front of a sanatarium, producing a cyclonic mix-up from which he emerged on crutches.

The final action is back on the pier. A couple of boys in a boat discovered the sleeping fisherman and tied his line to their skiff. The fisherman was pulled into the river, where he awoke and scrambled back to the pier. He had been thrust out of a dream world of money, into a real world of dampness.

A BIG JOKE.—A boy sought refuge behind a water trough and routed his enemy with a few handfuls of water. Filled with a spirit of devilry, he grasped the opportunity of playing a joke on a chap who was drawing a bucket of water from the trough. He induced the "mark" to hold his hat in the crook of his arm while, during the course of a funny story, he filled the hat with water. The innocent victim, seeing no humor in the story, attempted to put his hat on, whereby he was drenched. He seized the joker threateningly and was about to duck him in the trough, when the approach of a mutual friend prompted him to extend the joke. The second sucker was treated like the first, and after a comical mix-up, the three decided to take it out on Pat, the alderman, who was approaching. Pat's high hat looked like easy meat for the jokers, and with the aid of a few cigars and much persuasion, they succeeded in getting the alderman to listen to the story. The hat was filled with water and the expectant jokers waited for the denouement. It came, but not as they had expected. Pat carefully lifted a tin can from his hat and poured the water on the ground. The jokers collapsed and the alderman started away the victor in the big joke.

LUX FILMS.

BILL AS AN OPERATOR.—Bill appears as a cinematograph operator, with most ludicrous results. Bill, as usual, cannot resist the fascinations of ladies, and even when engaged in turning the "handle" pays scant attention to his duties. First he turns too slowly, and the audience in the picture theater are much annoyed at the slow movement of the characters as they appear on the screen. The manager makes a complaint to Bill, and our hero forthwith commences to simply rush the film through, with the natural result that the characters tear along at breakneck speed. Then, owing to a love passage with a lady vender of chocolates, Bill works the film the wrong way. Everything, naturally enough, is reversed, and the long suffering audience witnesses horses galloping backwards, people walking on their heads, etc. All this time Bill, sublimely unconscious of the trouble he is causing, is snatching kisses, until he is rudely awakened to the stern realities of life by a brawny attendant, who lifts him up and flings him into the road.

NECESSITY IS THE MOTHER OF INVENTION.—An artist, more than usually hard up, is at his wits' end how to raise the necessary amount of cash required. His wife comes to his aid and by a happy inspiration they hit upon a scheme. Dressing the model to resemble a blind man, they take it out and, placing it in a court, fix a card in the coat, "Spare a penny, please." The results are excellent, and securing the proceeds of the pathetic appeal, the artist and his wife retire. Meantime, a wandering vagrant is struck by the lonely figure of the model, and hoping it in his arms, he takes the model to his room, changes clothes, and sits in the model's place. The artist and his wife have a severe shock when they find the "poor old man" has failed to raise a cent, and still more so when the model takes to his heels and bolts. Meantime the dummy has been found by the police and is tenderly carried to the station. Here the fact that the "dead" body is but an artist's model is solemnly arrived at, and, finding the owner's card in the figure's pockets, it is carried back to the artist, who affectionately embraces the unconscious carmer of a little "ready."

VALLEY FOLKS.—"No, once and for all—no!" angrily declared Joe Benem. His daughter Sue might refuse Jack Blake, as indeed she had done a few moments before, but she should never marry Ned Wright.

Sue, however, with grandmother and grandfather on her side, had decided differently. That very afternoon they were to slip away to the little church, after which the old people had promised to meet them with Sue's clothes and give the bride and groom their parting blessing.

Two years had passed to Ned and Sue, two very short and happy years—with only one cloud to mar their horizon. Joe Benem still remained obstinate! Nevertheless, dear old grandmother still held out hope and, since the birth of little Ned, had been constantly planning how to inveigle her son to their cottage.

Then, when one day a letter arrived from Sue, stating that Ned had been taken ill with a fever and imploring her grandmother to come at once, the old lady felt confident that she might induce the girl's father to accompany her. In this she was doomed to disappointment—for not only did he refuse to go to his daughter, but likewise forbade the old people making the trip in his rig. Nothing daunted, however, the couple set out on foot arriving to find Sue unconscious beside the body of her husband. Hurrying the old man off for help, grandmother finally succeeded in reviving the young widow.

Then, after Ned had been laid to rest, with kindhearted Jack Blake's aid, Sue, with her baby and grandmother, were driven up to the old home. Quietly they alighted and stole into the house.

Joe Benem was seated in his accustomed armchair, torn with the desire to rush to his daughter's aid, yet angry at himself for wishing to yield.

Softly Sue opened the door and crept to her father's chair, so that he awoke from his reverie to look into little Ned's wondering baby eyes and find his daughter kneeling at his side.

With a glad cry, Joe Benem gathered them to his breast, mentally vowing that there should be no more unhappiness in their lives if he could help it.

VALUE—BEYOND PRICE.—Captain Smith sails away on his vessel for a trip around South America and through the Pacific, leaving behind him his wife and little girl, whom he dearly loves. The ship is reported lost with all on board, with the exception of a cabin boy who is picked up in mid-ocean. The captain's wife struggles to support her child, but owing to her rapidly failing health she fights a losing battle with poverty. One by one her valued possessions find their way to the pawnshop, where the kindhearted old pawnbroker Levy becomes interested in the sad-faced woman and the pretty child, who never seem able to redeem any of their possessions.

The last article of value left in Mrs. Smith's possession is her wedding ring, and Levy refuses to take this. Instead he offers her help, which the widow proudly refuses. She insists that she can go out and get work. Levy seeing that he can help in no other way, offers to care for little Marie, and to this the mother finally gives her consent. Half in jest, Levy gives to the mother a pawn ticket for the little girl, which he fills out to read that "a precious jewel, value beyond price," has been left with him and can be redeemed "at any time." The mother leaves the little one in Levy's care and upon reaching home and finding herself mentally stricken, she puts the pawn ticket he has given her in an envelope which she entrusts to a friendly janitress, to be given into no other hands than those of her husband should it be that he is not dead.

And he is not. He has been cast up on a fertile island in the South Seas, where he lives a Crusoe-like existence for ten years, and incidentally finds buried treasure which makes him rich.

He is finally rescued by a passing steamer and brought back to his own country, only to find that in his absence his wife has died, and no one knows the fate of his child.

He only finds, in an envelope addressed to him in the hand of his dying wife, a pawn ticket for a "precious jewel" which she has pledged. Thinking the jewel to be some gift of his to his wife, which she desired him to have as a remembrance, he goes to the pawnshop and is there waited upon by a sweet faced girl of fifteen to whom he is at once attracted. The girl is unable to find any article in the shop with a ticket corresponding in number to the ticket which the Captain carries, and appeals to her foster father, Levy, to help her find the gentleman's goods.

Levy at once recognizes the ticket as the one he gave for his little adopted daughter. Although he dislikes to surrender the one joy of his life, he finally decides to reunite father and daughter. The latter have the old pawnbroker make his home with them, so the reunion brings happiness to all.

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN.—John Halifax, an orphan, trudges to town to make his fortune. There he is befriended first by Ursula March, the daughter of the richest man in town, who gives him food, and later by Abel Fletcher, a rich Quaker. Fletcher's invalid son takes a great fancy to John, and through his influence John is employed in his father's mill. After five years of faithful work, John has risen to the position of foreman. He and Fletcher's son, Phineas, have become fast friends.

Against the wishes of his father, Phineas persuades John to take him to a theater. The trip proves too much for the invalid, and John carries him home from the theater in a fainting condition. Fletcher is furious with John, and drives him from the house.

About this time there is great discontent at the mill, among the workmen. Fletcher decides to close it down. After six weeks of starvation, the workmen and their families come in a crowd to the mill and demand that they be given the grain which is stored there. Rather than accede to their demands, Fletcher hurls the bags of grain into the river. This so infuriates the mob that they try to set fire to the mill and put an end to Fletcher.

Unable to control the mob, John helps Fletcher, his son and Ursula, to escape. Finally he wins Fletcher's consent to a compromise with the men. Realizing that he owes his property and life to John, Fletcher asks his forgiveness for his former harsh treatment. John becomes Fletcher's adopted son and wins Ursula for his bride.

THE BIRTHDAY PRESENT.—In a well-appointed house a nursemaid is taking a little girl for a walk, receiving many warnings from the mother to be careful not to lose sight of her charge. Gazing into a shop window, however, she allows the child to stray away. The little one is found by an old woman, who sells all her clothing, dresses her as a boy, and sends her out to beg. Passersby are generous, but a ruffian forces the child to give up all the money she has received. The old woman casts the child out, and the little one is in a helpless plight until a boy takes pity and takes her home. The lad's parents befriend the child. They see a notice in the paper in which a large reward is offered for information about the child, and their kindness in taking her in meets with due recognition. It is the mother's birthday, but none of her presents interest her in comparison with the return of her child.

THE OHAMI TROUPE OF ACROBATS.—A capital film showing the acrobatic performances of a celebrated Continental troupe. The performers are one lady and two gentlemen who go through some wonderful ground tumbling, lightning somersault throwing, and astonishing pyramid acrobatic feats. The lady finishes her performance by throwing fifty somersaults in succession. A tastefully arranged stage, and the beautiful dresses of the performers, make the film particularly attractive.

THE PRICE OF A SACRIFICE.—Mr. Pousol, a blind old gentleman, promises his ward, Margaret, in marriage with his son, John. Margaret agrees to the union simply for the sake of her kind old guardian, as she does not love John, and besides, she knows him to be a gambler.

One evening at his club John loses heavily and is forced to borrow a large sum of money, which he also loses. He is thereby placed in a very bad position. His creditor insists that he pay the 5,000 francs before the next day is over. John is very much dismayed, and in despair he contemplates tampering with his father's safe. A good friend of his, Phillip Rosay, notices John's agitation and quietly follows him. John proceeds straight to his father's study. John is surprised to see his friend come in after him; Phillip, having divined his friend's intention, sharply reproves him for his base conduct. John, having become extremely nervous, unconsciously touches the safe, and immediately the sound of bells is heard through the house. They flee to the door, but by an ingenious mechanical process the door swings to, and they are fast in a trap! The door opens suddenly and Margaret, revolver in hand, confronts them. Beside her is her blind guardian. Her arms drop to her side when she recognizes her fiance and the man she secretly loves. She motions them not to move, and offering an explanation to her guardian which satisfies him that nothing is amiss—that it was a false alarm—she leads him back to his room. She soon returns and reproaches the two young men.

In order to spare Margaret the shame of her fiance's guilt, Phillip takes the blame himself. Margaret can hardly believe the man she has known ever to be a man of the strictest honor could have stooped so low, but she has the words from his own lips, and she sadly leaves the room.

Next day John is obliged to confess to his father his gambling debt. In order to save his son's honor the father consents to pay the debt, but he orders his son to leave his house.

Before leaving, John releases Margaret from her vow, recommending that she accept Phillip, who loves her, stating that she and Phillip will fill the place of children to his aged father far better that he could ever do. Overcome with sorrow and repentance, John departs, and the noble Phillip finds in the love of Margaret a full reward for his great sacrifice.

THE LAUNDRY GIRL'S GOOD-NIGHT.—After a long day's work, the laundry girl is very weary, and she sits down to rest. Presently, before her very eyes, and with the utmost ease and grace, the objects of her careful labor, collars, cuffs, shirts, etc., all white and glossy, take unto themselves the form of living things and with one accord come forward to make acknowledgment to the little laundry maiden of their appreciation of her skilful treatment of themselves. After many a lively frolic, performed for the amusement of the tired girl, the grateful bits of linen arrange themselves so as to form a fantastic and most magnificent "good-night."

NATURE'S NOBLEMAN.—Once in a while we hear of men who make sacrifices for their friends or family, but rarely do they cast aside the love of a beautiful woman for the sake of another's happiness. Cameron was of a different type, however. In business he was liberal, considerate of his employees and honest in his dealings with the public with whom he dealt. His love for Agnes was of the highest and most enduring type, the best that man could give her, and she seemed to be satisfied until the day Cameron's brother came home, wan and pale, his health wrecked by fever, caring very little whether he lived or died. Then, at the request of Cameron, she began to nurse the brother back to health and strength. She soon found her interest in this weakling to be more than charitable. Gradually her affection grew until she realized a union with her betrothed could never be. The brother grew strong and rugged and with his change of health came a desire to claim this girl for his own, yet he dared not speak the words which he knew must break a brother's heart. He finally decided to go away and let time bring about a change of feeling which perhaps she entertained for him, only out of pity. When he tried to tell her he was going, they were seated in the parlor and she was reading to him. Suddenly she laid aside her book and looked into his eyes. The magic of that glance forever killed his good intentions and before he realized the possible consequences she was in his arms, kissing him passionately. Cameron came in at this moment and took in the scene at a glance. Crushing back his emotion, he smilingly congratulated the pair and went to his room. There he gave way to his feelings and cried like a child. The more he debated with himself the more he realized the necessity of leaving the scene of his troubles, so he packed a grip and slipped out of the house after leaving a note for his mother and brother.

We find Cameron, years after, sitting in his bachelor apartment looking at a photograph, the light from his reading lamp shining down on his face as he calmly smoked his pipe and dreamed of the past.

"IMP."

THE ASPIRATIONS OF GERALD AND PERCY.—Gerald and Percy, tiring of the humdrum occupation of clerking in a department store, become interested in dramatic pursuits and aspire to become great emotional actors. In their daily work of waiting upon customers they seek to enliven the hours by interspersing scenes from various dramas with the price and quality of goods, much to the disgust and confusion of the various purchasers. They are in consequence transferred from one department to another, but all to no avail, as they grow wilder and wilder in their demonstrations, until they are finally kicked out of the store.

By putting on a terrific front, they are finally engaged by a theatrical manager and appear in part of a performance of a drama, for the audience does not allow them to proceed far, but rising as one man, they hurl everything they can lay their hands on at the heads of the two aspirants. Gerald and Percy are then forcibly ejected from the stage door of the theater.

Wandering aimlessly about, the ambitious pair see a sign calling for men for the army and decide to enlist. Driving the recruiting sergeant almost insane by their attempts at familiarity, they are finally marched off to the barracks.

Tiring of military life, they desert and, after many hairbreadth escapes from recapture, arrive at the home of their former friend, Tony, the Italian organ grinder, who once impersonated for them so successfully the "Count of Montebello." After much begging on their part, he supplies them with some of his own raiment and they leave his house filled with gratitude.

Tony, foolishly desiring to show off before his wife, arrays himself in one of the uniforms and is promptly arrested as a deserter by the pursuing soldiers, taken to headquarters, and sentenced to be shot, and only the timely arrival of Tony's wife, who dashes in front of the firing squad, prevents the carrying out of the sentence. Her explanations added to his protestations of innocence result in his being released, after being duly stripped of his uniform.

Gerald and Percy return to their hallroom and sitting down, in order to talk over their next move, Gerald discovers a large roll of bills in one of the pockets of the Italian's clothes. Filled with overwhelming joy at the discovery, they proceed to divide their ill-gotten gains, when Tony appears and with the aid of his trusty stiletto relieves them not only of the money, but their clothing as well, and leaves them arrayed in a couple of barrels.

TWIXT LOYALTY AND LOVE.—Frank McCracken is placed in the managing editor's seat by the owner of "The Daily Call." His promotion makes it possible for him to marry Margaret, daughter of the Hon. Hiram Johnson, reform candidate for mayor.

Frank and Margaret call upon Johnson at his campaign headquarters, where Frank tells him of his promotion and asks Margaret's hand in marriage. Edward Cranston, private secretary to Johnson, secretly in love with Margaret, overhears Johnson's hearty consent and vows to break off the match. He rifles Johnson's safe and unearths evidence proving Johnson's connection with street paving graft of twenty years before. He then goes to the office of "The Daily Call," and surreptitiously places the papers upon Frank McCracken's desk.

The young managing editor reads the incriminating evidence and is filled with consternation. Loyalty to his newspaper commands him to publish the story, which, upon the eve of the election, will mean the blasting of Johnson's political career and the ruination of his good name.

He hastens to Johnson and asks him either to verify or deny the authenticity of the data, but Johnson will do neither and bids him choose between his duty to his newspaper and his duty to the father of his intended wife. Margaret, entering and believing her father to be innocent, orders Frank to leave her presence, as she places loyalty to her father before devotion to her lover.

Cranston in the meantime has suffered the pangs of remorse, and going to Margaret, confesses his share in the matter and tells her he was actuated in so doing through his love for her and his jealousy towards Frank McCracken. She is filled with loathing at his treachery to her father and orders him from the house.

Going to Frank, in the composing room of the "Call," she finds him and a "make-up" man, bending over the paged story, which is about to be stereotyped. She makes a final appeal to him to suppress the story, but he is compelled to refuse her request. The page is locked and the foreman raises the form to carry it away. Margaret, in desperation, seizes a mallet lying on the stone and shatters the type in the locked form. It is press time, the story is "killed"—her father's name has been saved. At this moment a message is brought to Frank which advises him that the opposing candidate to Johnson has withdrawn because of graft charges and that in consequence Johnson is assured of election. Margaret has not only saved her father's reputation, but has been the means of his political triumph.

Frank, realizing that he has individually done all in his power for his paper's interests, turns to Margaret, shows her the message and congratulates her upon the success of her coup. She, instantly forgiving him for what he attempted to do, extends her arms to him and the harmony between them is fully restored.

HEARTS OF THE WEST.—Dick Cross and another cowboy happen to be watching Alice, the banker's daughter, picking her way among the rocks when they see her jump back and utter a piercing scream. Instantly, Dick has whipped out his six-shooter—a shot flies over the head of the petrified girl and crushes a seven-foot rattler.

Naturally, the gratitude of the girl is a sure means of introduction, which grows into acquaintanceship, and lands them both in her father's bank, which is fortunately open through vacancies: Dick, securing the position of teller. The warm acquaintance between Dick and the girl matures into a strong bond of love, and although of poor parentage, the banker's family give their consent to the engagement.

With the initial visit of Dick's parents to the home of the banker, the latter are visibly shocked at their plain and homely appearance and they receive the old couple rather coldly. For the first time Dick becomes ashamed of his honest but old-fashioned, shabbily attired parents and he leaves them unwelcomed in his fiance's home.

Shortly after, a package of money is missed at the bank and Dick is suspected and arrested. The girl appeals to her father, but he is obdurate and will not interfere. Apprising Dick's parents of his plight, the girl accompanies them to the jail, where with tears and words of love, they assure the boy of their absolute faith in his innocence.
